1. INTRODUCTION

1. Regulation 1/2003¹, the keystone of the modernisation of the European Union's antitrust enforcement rules and procedures, entered into application on 1 May 2004. Article 44 of Regulation 1/2003 provides that the Commission shall by 1 May 2009, i.e. after five years of application, report to the European Parliament and the Council on its functioning.
2. Regulation 1/2003 was the result of the most comprehensive reform of antitrust procedures since 1962.² It modernised the procedural rules embodied in Council Regulation 17 of 1962³, which govern how the EC Treaty's provisions on anti-competitive agreements (Article 81 EC) and abuses of dominant position (Article 82 EC) are enforced.⁴ Its key objectives are effective and coherent enforcement of the EC antitrust rules in the interests of consumers and businesses, while bringing about a more level playing field and reducing red tape for companies operating in Europe.
3. The main features of Regulation 1/2003 are:
 - The abolition of the practice of notifying business agreements to the Commission, enabling the Commission to focus its resources on the important fight against cartels and other serious violations of the antitrust rules.
 - The empowerment of national competition authorities and courts to apply EC antitrust rules in their entirety, so that there are multiple enforcers and therefore wider application of the EC antitrust rules.

¹ Council Regulation (EC) No 1/2003 of 16 December 2002 on the implementation of the rules on competition laid down in Articles 81 and 82 of the Treaty (OJ L 1, 04.01.2003, p.1), as amended by Council Regulation (EC) No 411/2004 of 26 February 2004 repealing Regulation (EEC) No 3975/87 and amending Regulations (EEC) No 3976/87 and (EC) No 1/2003, in connection with air transport between the Community and third countries (OJ L 68, 6.3.2004, p.1) and Council Regulation (EC) No 1419/2006 of 25 September 2006 repealing Regulation (EEC) No 4056/86 laying down detailed rules for the application of Articles 85 and 86 of the Treaty to maritime transport, and amending Regulation (EC) No 1/2003 as regards the extension of its scope to include cabotage and international tramp services (OJ L 269, 28.09.2006, p. 1), hereinafter "Regulation 1/2003". Articles quoted in the text without specific references relate to articles of Regulation 1/2003.

³ Council Regulation No 17 (EEC): First Regulation implementing Articles 85 and 86 of the Treaty (OJ P 13, 21.02.1962, p.204), hereinafter "Regulation 17".

⁴ To the extent that the Commission applies Articles 53 and 54 of the EEA Agreement (if trade between one or more EU Member States and one or more EFTA Member States which have ratified the Agreement is affected) it does so in accordance with its existing procedural rules, namely Regulation 1/2003, on the basis of Article 5 of Council Regulation 2894/94 concerning arrangements for implementing the Agreement on the European Economic Area, OJ L 305, 30.11.1994, p. 6–8. To this end, see Decision of the EEA Joint Committee of 24.09.2004 amending Annex XIV (Competition), Protocol 21 (On the implementation of competition rules applicable to undertakings) and Protocol 23 (Concerning the cooperation between the surveillance authorities) to the EEA Agreement, OJ L 64, of 10.03.2005, p.57.

- More level playing field for businesses operating cross-border as all competition enforcers, including the national competition authorities and national courts, are obliged to apply EC antitrust rules to cases that affect trade between Member States.
 - Close cooperation between the Commission and national competition authorities in the European Competition Network (the "ECN").
 - Enhanced enforcement tools for the Commission so that it is better equipped to detect and address breaches of the EC antitrust rules.
4. In the context of Regulation 1/2003, the Commission further adopted the implementing Regulation 773/2004⁵ as well as guidance on the cooperation of public enforcers in the ECN, the Commission's mechanisms for cooperation with national courts, the instrument of guidance letters and the handling of complaints by the Commission and guidelines on the criterion of effect on trade and the application of Article 81(3) EC.⁶
 5. The preparation of the Report has involved a fact-finding phase in which the experience of stakeholders has been solicited. A public consultation was launched on 24 July 2008, which consisted of specific questions on the different features of the Regulation and sought substantiated input. This questionnaire was made public on the Commission's website⁷ and was also sent to individual consumer associations and judges' associations in order to maximise its reach. The Commission received 45 submissions from businesses and business associations, law firms, lawyers' associations and academia.⁸ The Member States' competition authorities ("national competition authorities") have been closely associated with the preparation of this Report and have provided detailed input.
 6. This Staff Working Paper, which accompanies the Report, follows the same structure and is divided into six main sections that address the principal facets of Regulation 1/2003 and its functioning in practice: part 2 deals with the system change from the notification system to direct application of Article 81(3) EC; part 3 reports on how the Commission has used the tools provided by the Regulation for effective enforcement in its enforcement procedures; part 4 examines how the Regulation has led to more level playing field through the application of EC competition law in accordance with Article 3 of Regulation 1/2003; part 5 looks into the enforcement of Articles 81 and 82 EC by national competition authorities and cooperation in the ECN; part 6 addresses the interaction of the Commission with national courts and part 7 raises certain aspects of the interface with third country enforcement.

7. The aim of the Report is to understand and assess how modernisation of the EC antitrust enforcement during the first five years has worked. The Report is a stock-taking exercise and therefore it leaves open the question of whether any amendment to the existing rules or practice is required. It will serve as a basis for the Commission to assess, in a further stage, whether it is appropriate to propose any revision of the Regulation.

2. SYSTEM CHANGE: FROM THE NOTIFICATION SYSTEM TO DIRECT APPLICATION OF ARTICLE 81(3) EC

2.1. Background

8. Regulation 1/2003 introduced a fundamental change in the framework for applying Articles 81 and 82 EC. It replaced the centralised notification and authorisation system which was created by Regulation 17 by an enforcement system based on the direct application of Articles 81 and 82 in their entirety.
9. Under Regulation 17, undertakings had to notify agreements to the Commission in order to benefit from the exception contained in Article 81(3) EC. The Commission had exclusive competence to apply this provision by way of formal exemption decisions, with national competition authorities and courts not being empowered to grant exemptions. The Commission's monopoly on the application of Article 81(3) EC and the system of prior notification and administrative authorisation resulted in a significant backlog of notifications, the closure of 90% of notifications informally and a diversion of resources away from the investigation and prosecution of serious antitrust infringements.
10. Under Regulation 1/2003, the Commission, national competition authorities and courts have the power to apply Articles 81 and 82 EC in full.⁹ In particular, agreements which are caught by Article 81(1) EC but which satisfy the conditions of Article 81(3) EC are now directly valid and enforceable, no prior decision to that effect being required.¹⁰ Undertakings can now invoke the exception rule contained in Article 81(3) EC as a defence in proceedings conducted by the Commission, national competition authorities and courts. At the same time, agreements or practices which are caught by Article 81(1) EC and do not fulfil the conditions of Article 81(3) EC are prohibited and void ab initio, without the need for prior administrative or judicial intervention.¹¹
11. The change from a system of notification and administrative authorisation to one of direct application has been remarkably smooth in practice. Overall, neither the case practice of the Commission and the national enforcers, nor the experience reported by the business and legal community indicate major difficulties with the direct application of Article 81(3) EC. The system change has supported a shift in priorities of public enforcers.

⁹ Articles 5 and 6 of Regulation 1/2003 state that the competition authorities of the Member States and the national courts have the power to apply Articles 81 and 82 EC.

12. The elimination of the notification system and the Commission's exclusive power to apply Article 81(3) EC also removed an important obstacle to private enforcement of the Community competition rules. Under Regulation 17, the private enforcement of Articles 81 and 82 EC could effectively be blocked by a notification of the agreement to the Commission and if it were not clear whether Article 81(3) EC was applicable, the national court would have to suspend proceedings.¹² Regulation 1/2003 has served as a first step to open the way for the increased private enforcement of Articles 81 and 82 EC, the importance of which has been explicitly recognised by the European Court of Justice.¹³ The Commission has launched a further policy initiative in this area with a view to foster private damages claims.¹⁴

2.2. The change in system after 5 years experience with Regulation 1/2003

2.2.1. The Commission's enhanced priority setting

13. One of the objectives of the modernisation reform was to allow the Commission to better focus its resources on areas where they make a significant contribution to the enforcement of Articles 81 and 82 EC. In the run-up to the entry into application of Regulation 1/2003, the Commission had already started to shift the focus of its case-handling priorities from the follow-up of notifications to a more pro-active emphasis on pursuing serious infringements.¹⁵ Since May 2004, it has been able to implement the new enforcement system without any major interruption and to complete the shift in its enforcement priorities during the first years of application of Regulation 1/2003.
14. Modernisation has clearly enabled the Commission to be more proactive. This is illustrated by the identification of sectors for priority action in the form of large scale sector inquiries in key sectors of the EU economy, which represent an important share of EU GDP and are of key concern for consumers. Since the entry into application of Regulation 1/2003, the Commission has undertaken inquiries in the media¹⁶, energy, retail banking, business insurance and pharmaceuticals sectors.¹⁷
15. The electricity and gas sectors constitute a key input to the overall economy and are fundamental services for citizens: together they represent a value of total retail sales before tax of more than €500 billion per year. Retail banking – defined as services to consumers and small and medium-sized enterprises – remains the most important sub-sector of banking, representing over 50% of total EU activity in terms of gross income. The Commission estimated that in 2004 retail banking activity in the European Union generated gross income of € 250-275 billion, equivalent to approximately 2% of total EU GDP. Business insurance is of vital importance for both large and small businesses, given that the ability to insure a given risk may make or break a particular business model. It is estimated that EU insurers collect € 375 billion in non-life premiums every year. In 2008, the Commission launched an inquiry into the market for prescription and non-prescription medicines, which is worth over €138 billion ex factory and €214 billion at retail prices. This translates into a retail expenditure of approximately €430 for each EU citizen in 2007.

16. The more pro-active stance of the Commission is further illustrated in its decision-making practice. Today, the Commission is concentrating considerable resources on addressing infringements in economically highly important sectors, such as financial services, energy, IT, media and pharmaceuticals, which directly impact consumers. In addition, the Commission has consistently further increased the depth of its analysis over the last years. The investigation and examination of cases is characterised by increasing complexity and the use of greater sophisticated methodology in the context of the more effects-based approach applied by the Commission outside anti-cartel enforcement. Since the late 1990s, the Commission has used this approach in its analysis of restrictive horizontal and vertical agreements under Article 81 EC. Guidance has now been given as to how the Commission uses an effects-based approach to establish its enforcement priorities under Article 82 EC in relation to exclusionary conduct.¹⁸
17. The increasingly complexity of many cases is reflected in the ever greater role played by inspections in the investigation of cases, including outside the area of cartels. It is also illustrated by the steep increase in inspection days used for the investigation of non-cartel antitrust cases.¹⁹
18. The greater effectiveness of the Commission is also reflected by an increase in the number of enforcement decisions adopted. While it is difficult to isolate the impact of the reform from other contemporaneous developments,²⁰ a comparison can be made with two previous distinct periods:
 - (i) the approximately comparable period in time from 1 January 2000 until the entry into application of Regulation 1/2003 during which the Commission's enforcement action was already increasingly oriented by the pending reform;
 - (ii) the preceding decade during which the Commission's antitrust enforcement was still largely dominated by the notification system.

¹⁸ OJ C 45, 24.02.2009, p. 7.

¹⁹ The overall amount of man days for inspections in 2008 was 773.5 compared with a total of 213 man days in 2005.

19. By adopting 34 decisions imposing fines in cartel cases since the entry into application of Regulation 1/2003 until 31 March 2009, compared with 27 in the period from 1 January 2000 to 30 April 2004, the Commission has sustained and further boosted its focus on enforcement against cartels despite the heightened awareness of infringing undertakings and the ensuing increased difficulty of investigations. In contrast, during the entire decade from 1 January 1990 until 31 December 1999, the Commission had only adopted 18 decisions against cartels.²¹
20. Moreover, the Commission adopted 27 decisions enforcing Articles 81 and 82 (final decisions on substance) outside the field of cartels in the period since 1 May 2004.²² By comparison, in the period from 1 January 2000 until 30 April 2004, only 17 prohibition decisions were adopted.
21. The Commission's more pro-active stance is also reflected in the fact that broadly 50% of decisions taken since 1 May 2004 resulted from ex officio investigations not based on leniency information, one third were triggered by leniency applications and one tenth was based on complaints. By comparison, in the 1990s, own-initiative procedures accounted for only about 15% of new cases registered, with most procedures being triggered as the result of notifications. The effects of enhanced priority setting are also visible from the decrease in number of open cases (e.g. 943 in 2000 decreasing to 225 in 2007).
22. Enhanced priority-setting is also reflected in the choice of instrument in individual cases and notably in the use by the Commission of the power of making commitments offered by undertakings binding and enforceable to address an identified competition problem. Since the entry into application of the Regulation, the Commission has adopted 13 decisions under Article 9.²³
23. The huge increase in the enforcement of Articles 81 and 82 EC by the national competition authorities has meant that the enforcement of the EC competition rules is now commonplace throughout the EU.²⁴ This allows the Commission to focus on cases and areas in accordance with its own priority setting. The Commission also contributes to effective and coherent enforcement by the national competition authorities through cooperation in the ECN.

2.2.2. Case practice under Article 81(3) EC

24. Under Regulation 1/2003, agreements that fulfil the cumulative conditions of Article 81(3) EC are legal without the need for an affirmative decision by an authority. In the enforcement system established by Regulation 1/2003, the vast majority of agreements thus do not call for the intervention of any authority or enforcement body and are naturally not the subject of any decision or other act by such authorities.
25. Moreover, Regulation 1/2003 did not change the instrument of block exemption regulations which confers legality under Article 81(3) EC on agreements that fulfil ²¹ See table in the annex.

²² See table in the annex.

²³ See part 3.

²⁴ See part 5.

the requirements set out in the relevant Commission regulation.²⁵ To the extent that an agreement fulfils the requirements of a block exemption regulation, no individual assessment under Article 81(3) EC is warranted.

26. In the enforcement system of Regulation 1/2003, Article 81(3) EC operates as a defence that undertakings may invoke in regard of agreements that are caught by Article 81(1) EC and are not block-exempted.²⁶ In the framework of the Commission's enforcement action during the reporting period, the conditions of Article 81(3) EC have been routinely considered in enforcement cases.²⁷ If parties can provide a valid justification for their conduct, i.e. if Article 81(3) EC is likely to be fulfilled, the case is often not pursued further under the Commission's system of priority setting. Cases in which Article 81(3) EC aspects have been considered may also result in commitment decisions.
27. Extensive reasoning reflecting the analysis under Article 81(3) EC is thus naturally contained in prohibition decisions in cases that called for an in-depth examination under Article 81(3) EC, including in light of the evidence and argument put forward by the parties concerned to substantiate their claim that Article 81(3) EC was fulfilled.²⁸
28. For example, in *MasterCard*²⁹, the Commission found that an association of banks restricted competition by deciding on multilateral interchange fees ('MIFs').³⁰ MasterCard invoked Article 81(3) EC claiming that a revenue transfer (the MIF) was needed from the acquiring side to the issuing side to correct an asymmetry of costs between them and that it generated efficiencies in the form of increased output of the system. In its analysis under the first condition of Article 81(3) EC, the Commission

²⁵ This is without prejudice to the right of the Commission or national competition authorities to withdraw the benefit of block exemption regulations in individual cases, pursuant to Article 29 of Reg. 1/2003. The following block exemptions have been adopted by the Commission: Commission Regulation No. 2790/1999 of 22 December 1999 on the application of Article 81(3) of the Treaty to categories of vertical agreements and concerted practices (OJ L 336, 29.12.1999, p. 21-25), Commission Regulation No 2658/2000 of 29 November 2000 on the application of Article 81(3) of the Treaty to categories of specialisation agreements (OJ L 304, 05.12.2000, p.3), Commission Regulation No 2659/2000 of 29 November 2000 on the application of Article 81(3) to categories of research and development agreements (OJ L 304, 05.12.2000, p.7), Commission Regulation No. 1400/2002 of 31 July 2002 on the application of Article 81(3) to categories of vertical agreements and concerted practices in the motor vehicle sector (OJ L 203, 01.08.2002, p.30-41), Commission Regulation No. 358/2003 of 27 February 2004 on the application of Article 81(3) of the Treaty to certain categories of agreements, decisions and concerted practices in the insurance sector (OJ L 53, 28.2.2003, p.8-16), Commission Regulation No. 772/2004 of 27 April 2004 on the application of Article 81(3) of the Treaty to categories of technology transfer agreements (OJ L 123, 27.04.2004, p.11-17) and Council Regulation (EC) No 246/2009 of 26 February 2009 on the application of Article 81(3) of the Treaty to certain categories of agreements, decisions and concerted practices between liner shipping companies (consortia), OJ L 79, 25.03.2009, p.1.

²⁶ Recital 5 of Regulation 1/2003.

notably verified whether the model underlying MasterCard's MIF was founded on realistic assumptions, whether the methodology used to implement that model could be considered objective and reasonable and whether the MIF had indeed led to the positive effects claimed. However, MasterCard failed to submit empirical evidence to demonstrate positive effects of its MIF on the market.

29. The Commission further concluded that MasterCard's MIF also did not fulfil the second condition of Article 81(3) EC. In this context, the Commission attributed particular importance to the question whether in setting a MIF, MasterCard used a methodology that guarantees from the outset that all consumers and, in particular, merchants obtain a fair share of the benefits. However, the cost benchmarks used by MasterCard were found to be largely arbitrary and inflated. Hence, without further evidence - which MasterCard did not submit - it was not proven that MasterCard's MIF had created efficiencies that benefit all customers, including merchants. Finally, MasterCard did not provide any empirical evidence on the actual effect of this MIF in the market although ECB statistics indicate that card schemes without a MIF display the highest card usage per capita in the EU. MasterCard had therefore not proven to the requisite standard that its MIF was indispensable to achieve a maximised system output or any claimed related efficiencies.
30. Further cases involving an extensive analysis under Article 81(3) EC in the financial services sector include *Morgan Stanley/Visa*³¹ and Groupeement des Cartes Bancaires.³²
31. In CISAC, the Commission adopted a prohibition decision against 24 European collecting societies for restricting competition by limiting their ability to offer their services to authors and commercial users outside their domestic territory resulting in a strict segmentation of the market on a national basis.³³ The parties did not bring forward arguments which specifically addressed the application of Article 81(3) EC. However, it was argued that the territorial restrictions constitute a pre-requisite for the mutual exchange of repertoires and, therefore, for collecting societies to offer multi-repertoire licences. The Commission did not dispute that the network of bilateral reciprocal representation agreements between collecting societies provides a ³¹ Case COMP/37860: The Commission fined Visa €10,200,000 for refusing to admit Morgan Stanley as a member without an objective justification. Visa relied on Article 81(3) EC arguing that Visa (as a system and as a whole) generated efficiencies. However, the Commission concluded that such arguments did not show that the first condition of Article 81(3) EC of the Treaty is fulfilled with respect to the application of the exclusionary rule which was at issue in the case ("the Rule"). The Commission did not find any indication that the Rule as it was applied to Morgan Stanley generated pro-competitive effects. Its negative effects on the offer of acquiring services to merchants, innovation in the relevant market, and on Morgan Stanley itself, were therefore not outweighed by efficiencies. The Commission also held that VISA had not succeeded in demonstrating that the application of the Rule was necessary to prevent free riding. See <http://ec.europa.eu/competition/antitrust/cases>.

national one-stop shop for a worldwide management of rights. However, it concluded that even without the restrictions, the alleged benefits, in particular the national one-stop-shops can still be provided. The restrictions are consequently not indispensable within the meaning of Article 81(3) EC. In addition, they eliminate competition on the markets for the administration of repertoires for other EEA CISAC members and the licensing of rights and therefore do not fulfil the forth of the cumulative conditions of Article 81(3) EC.

2.2.3. Application of Article 81(3) EC by national competition authorities

32. Regulation 1/2003 enables national competition authorities and courts to apply Articles 81 and 82 EC in full³⁴ and obliges them to apply EC competition law in all cases that fall within its scope of application.³⁵ The change in legal framework has resulted in a huge increase in enforcement of Articles 81 and 82 EC by the national competition authorities as from 2004.³⁶ In general, national competition authorities are putting emphasis on pro-actively pursuing serious infringements.
33. As regards the application of Article 81(3) EC, the impact of the reform is similar to its effects in Commission cases, with the additional aspect of numerous national laws following the example of the Regulation by removing notification systems for the application of national competition laws.
34. Similar to the case practice of the Commission and in line with the basic scheme of the Regulation, Article 81(3) EC is normally invoked as a defence in cases investigated by national competition authorities in view of a possible prohibition decision. The vast majority of national competition authorities now have direct experience of applying Article 81(3) EC. At least half of the national competition authorities have adopted decisions in which it was found that the conditions of Article 81(3) EC were not fulfilled. The conclusion of cases in which the national authority considered the conditions of Article 81(3) EC to be fulfilled, depends on national procedural rules and practices. Numerous national competition authorities are – like the Commission – able to close such cases without adopting a reasoned decision and indeed regularly do so if they consider that the conditions of Article 81(3) EC are likely to be fulfilled. To the extent that a decision by the authority is formally required, it has to comply with the last sentence of Article 5, according to which the national competition authorities may decide that there are no grounds for action on their part. Such decisions do not bind other enforcers or national courts. Cases that involve an analysis of the conditions of Article 81(3) EC may also be concluded by commitment decisions.
35. National competition authorities have carried out analyses of the application of Article 81(3) EC in a wide variety of sectors, including transport, food, energy, media and financial services. Many of these cases involved vertical restraints, and in particular, the application of the Vertical Restraints Block Exemption Regulation.³⁷

³⁴ Articles 5 and 6 of Regulation 1/2003.

³⁵ Article 3 of Regulation 1/2003.

³⁶ See parts 3 and 5.

³⁷ Commission Regulation No 2790/1999 of 22 December 1999 on the application of Article 81(3) of the Treaty to categories of vertical agreements and concerted practices (OJ L 336, 29.12.1999, p. 21-25).

36. Regulation 1/2003 does not oblige Member States to remove notification systems and exemption decisions in respect of national competition law. Nonetheless, a large majority of Member States have followed the model of Regulation 1/2003 by abolishing notification systems in the context of national competition law. In addition to not adopting clearance or exemption decisions in regard of Articles 81/82, most national competition authorities are thereby relieved of the obligation to deal with notifications in regard of national competition law, freeing up resources to focus on serious infringements. To date, the national competition laws of more than 20 Member States operate without notifications.
37. To the extent that notifications under national law persist and the parallel application of EC law pursuant to Article 3 of the Regulation is required in notified cases, national competition authorities cannot adopt exemption decisions in respect of Article 81 EC, pursuant to Article 5, last sentence. They only have the possibility to combine an exemption or clearance decision under national law with the “no grounds for action” conclusion envisaged by the last sentence of Article 5. Given the phase-out of notifications in a large number of national laws, this issue has played a minor role in practice. Notwithstanding this, the maintenance of notification systems in national law may represent a drain on the scarce resources of the national competition authorities concerned.
38. Overall, no particular problems have been reported by the national competition authorities in terms of applying Article 81(3) EC and it seems that the vast majority of decisions which have involved an in-depth analysis under Article 81(3) EC and which were scrutinised by review courts have been upheld.

2.2.4. Case practice of national courts

39. National courts have applied Article 81(3) EC in a wide variety of sectors, including transport, energy, pharmaceuticals, financial services, cosmetics and media. Many of these cases involved vertical restraints, in particular, selective distribution, franchise agreements and resale price maintenance. In many rulings by national courts, the application of the Vertical Restraints Block Exemptions (old and new) is assessed. For example, in Spain, there have been numerous judgments concerning the possible nullity of exclusive purchase agreements between oil companies and petrol stations, several of which involved the application of the Vertical Restraints Block Exemption. Similar proceedings have been brought in The Netherlands, where the validity of exclusive purchase agreements, and in particular, of non-compete clauses in these contracts between oil companies and petrol stations have been reviewed by several national courts on the basis of the Vertical Restraints Block Exemption. In a number of Member States (France, Germany and The Netherlands), there have been a variety of judgments relating to the application of the Motor Vehicles Block Exemption (old and new).
40. Judgments in the Member States that joined the EU in 2004 and 2007 involving the application of Article 81(3) EC are still relatively infrequent which can to a certain extent be attributed to the fact that EC competition law became applicable as of the date of accession only, with the effect that judicial proceedings under Article 81 EC are naturally less numerous and/or may not have reached the state of judgment yet.³⁸

41. Overall, the relative scarcity of judgments involving Article 81(3) EC seems in the first place to stem from what appears to be a relatively low level of enforcement of EC competition law in general by national courts in the EU. This corresponds to the criticism made by some stakeholders that not all national courts have sufficient experience and/or expertise to apply Articles 81 and 82 EC. However, it is not evident that national courts face particular difficulties in applying Article 81(3) EC over and above the complexities involved with applying Article 81(1) and Article 82 EC which have always been directly applicable.

2.3. Legal certainty debate and guidance practice

42. By granting validity and enforceability to all agreements that fulfil the conditions of Article 81(3) EC, Regulation 1/2003 removed uncertainty for a large number of agreements that remained in legal limbo under the old system inasmuch as only a very small number of agreements were covered by a formal exemption decision of the Commission.
43. The reform of the antitrust rules entailed a shift from giving comfort to individual agreements to a system in which the emphasis is on general guidance that can be helpful to numerous undertakings and other enforcers. This was a process which the Commission had already started prior to 2004 for vertical restraints³⁹ and horizontal cooperation agreements.⁴⁰ The 2004 Modernisation package included general guidelines on the application of Article 81(3) EC setting out the analytical framework for its application.⁴¹ Moreover, the Transfer of Technology Block Exemption and guidelines were adopted in 2004.⁴² The Commission regularly reviews its guidance, for example, it will review the Vertical and Horizontal Agreements Block Exemption Regulations by 2010. Such guidance is complemented by the ever-growing body of decision practice and case law.⁴³ On 9 February 2009,

the Commission published guidance on its enforcement priorities in applying Article 82 EC to abusive exclusionary conduct by dominant undertakings, in response to a strong demand from many stakeholders.⁴⁴ This paper outlines for the first time the analytical framework that the Commission employs when assessing the most commonly encountered forms of exclusionary conduct, such as exclusive dealing, rebates, tying and bundling, predatory practices, refusal to supply and margin squeeze.

44. In view of possible cases that may arise which are not covered by existing sources of orientation, the Commission issued a Notice on guidance letters.⁴⁵ In essence, the Notice enables undertakings to request for a guidance letter by the Commission when a case gives rise to genuine uncertainty because it presents novel or unresolved questions concerning the application of Articles 81 and 82 EC.⁴⁶ The Notice takes account of the rationale of the Regulation that the Commission is to give priority to enforcement tasks by pursuing serious infringements of Articles 81 and 82 EC.⁴⁷
45. During the reporting period, very few approaches have been made to the Commission for "informal guidance" as set out in the Notice on guidance letters. None of these approaches came close to fulfilling the conditions for making such a request, which must be made about novel or unresolved questions that give rise to genuine uncertainty, as opposed to providing what would amount to individual comfort letters as existed prior to modernisation.⁴⁸
46. Stakeholder feedback after 5 years of application of Regulation 1/2003 is nuanced and there is currently no evidence of real problems that have materialised.
47. A certain number of respondents to the public consultation reiterate that the Commission should provide more guidance, including in the form of inapplicability decisions.⁴⁹ Some stakeholders claim that a lack of legal certainty deters companies from pursuing certain investments that they would have contemplated with the protection of notification, or that certain transactions would be restructured so as to

It has also adopted Guidelines on the application of Article 81 of the Treaty to Maritime Transport Services, SEC (2008) 2151 final, 01.07.2008.

⁴⁹ On Article 10, see further part 3.

fall under the Merger Regulation (or national equivalents) with a loss of efficiencies. Similarly, some stakeholders have commented that the conditions for fulfilling the Notice are too tightly drawn. While the criterion of novel or unresolved questions is largely uncontroversial, some stakeholders have called for guidance letters to be made also available in cases involving complex products or complex market conditions. However, no concrete examples have been provided in support of this.

48. Other respondents have advanced more limited ideas, e.g. calling for more dialogue with the Commission services on novel issues or commercial transactions involving significant investments or encouraging Commission case teams to more often set out their thinking in publications of the EC Competition Policy Newsletters type. These submissions are made in a context where the vast majority of respondents have commended the direct application of Article 81(3) EC as a more efficient and rational system of enforcement. For the most part, undertakings seem to be comfortable with assessing for themselves whether their agreements are likely to be caught by Article 81 EC and have welcomed the abolition of the administrative burden and long timescales that was part and parcel of notifications made under Regulation 17. A number of lawyers have indicated that they have not been asked for many more formal opinions on the applicability of Article 81(3) EC than was the case prior to modernisation. Businesses have also expressed that they have not felt the need for formal guidance from the Commission in the period since Regulation 1/2003 entered into application. The Commission therefore concludes that it is now standard practice for undertakings to verify that their behaviour complies with the applicable legal requirements in many areas of law and that it is usually more effective and efficient for it to provide general guidance. Nonetheless, the Commission remains firmly committed to giving guidance on new or unresolved policy issues of general application which fulfil the conditions of the Notice on guidance letters.

2.4. The rule on burden of proof in Article 2

49. Regulation 1/2003 did not affect the substance of Article 81 EC, which is composed of a prohibition rule requiring an assessment of the anti-competitive object or an analysis of likely anti-competitive effects, and a defence, requiring an analysis of likely pro-competitive effects and the weighing up of those pro-competitive and anti-competitive effects.
50. Article 2 contains the ground-rule on the allocation of the burden of proof in EC competition law. It clarifies that the burden of proving an infringement rests with the authority, while undertakings claiming the benefit of Article 81(3) EC have the burden of proving that its conditions are fulfilled. This allocation of the burden of proof has been confirmed by the Court of Justice⁵⁰ and is in accordance with general principles of law that the party claiming a defence has to prove that the conditions attached to that defence are satisfied and corresponds to the case law of the Community Courts.⁵¹ No concrete examples of this rule having posed a particular problem in practice have been brought to the Commission's attention.

⁵⁰ Joined Cases C-204/00 and others Aalborg Portland [2004] ECR I-124, para 78.

⁵¹ See e.g. Cases 56/64 and 58/64 Etablissements Consten SàRL and Grundig-Verkaufs-GmbH v Commission [1965] ECR 299, at 347; Case T-34/92 Fiatagri and New Holland Ford v Commission

51. The Community Courts are providing additional refinement to the rule in Article 2. In terms of the Commission's enforcement practice, they have clarified that in the course of the examination of a case the apportionment of the burden of proof may vary inasmuch as evidence presented by one side may require the other to provide an explanation or justification, failing which it is permissible to conclude that the burden of proof has been discharged.⁵²
52. Article 2 of Regulation 1/2003 does not determine the standard of proof. Recital 5 of Regulation 1/2003 stipulates that national rules on the standard of proof are unaffected by the Regulation, although they must of course be compatible with general principles of Community law, and in particular cannot jeopardise the effet utile of Articles 81 and 82 EC, in particular, by raising the standard so high that the application of Article 81(1) EC becomes impossible or unduly difficult. A reference for a preliminary ruling has been made to the European Court of Justice asking if a national court applies Article 81 EC, is the evidence of a causal connection between concerted practice and market conduct to be adduced and appraised in accordance with the rules of national law, subject to the Community law principles of effectiveness and equivalence.⁵³
53. In relation to Commission proceedings, the Community Courts have developed an abundant body of case law concerning the assessment of evidence, including the admissibility of evidence and the evidentiary value of a given item of information. For instance, the Court of Justice recently confirmed in Dalmine that the prevailing principle regarding the admissibility of evidence in Community law is "the unfettered evaluation of evidence and the only relevant criterion for the purpose of assessing the evidence adduced relates to its credibility."⁵⁴ Nonetheless, this principle must be balanced in particular by respect for general principles of Community law such as the right to a fair legal process. Accordingly, the Court has for example held that the fact that certain information contained in an incriminating document must remain confidential (including the origin of the document) does not mean that the rest of the document cannot be used in evidence.⁵⁵ However the anonymous origin of an incriminating document shall be taken into account in assessing the credibility of the document and thus has a direct impact on its evidentiary value. Within the context of the Leniency Notice, the Commission has also addressed evidentiary issues through the concept of "added value", i.e. the extent to which evidence by its very nature and/or its level of detail strengthens the Commission's ability to prove the alleged cartel.⁵⁶

3. COMMISSION PROCEDURES – HOW THE COMMISSION HAS USED ITS TOOLS UNDER THE REGULATION FOR EFFECTIVE ENFORCEMENT

3.1. Background

54. Under the EC Treaty, the Commission has responsibility for implementing the competition rules in Articles 81 and 82 EC.⁵⁷ The Community enforcement system is that of an integrated public authority that has power to order infringements to be brought to an end and to impose sanctions for past behaviour. The Community system corresponds to the institutional choice of a majority of Member States.⁵⁸
55. Such systems imply that the same institution investigates and takes decisions on the cases handled, which has raised queries from a number of stakeholders. However, as far as decisions adopted are subject to independent judicial control, such systems are fully compatible with established case law of both the Community Courts as well as the European Court of Human Rights. To this regard, besides the checks and balances that exist within the Commission procedures⁵⁹, the decisions adopted by the Commission are subject to the judicial scrutiny by the Court of First Instance and the Court of Justice. In particular, the Community Courts have unlimited jurisdiction to review decisions whereby the Commission has fixed a fine or periodic penalty payment.⁶⁰
56. Issues relating to the compatibility of the Community enforcement system with the rights of defence of the parties in competition proceedings were raised in the context of appeals against Commission decisions before the Community Courts and were rejected by the latter.⁶¹ The Community enforcement system also satisfies the requirements of the European Convention on Human Rights ("ECHR"). Under the case law of the European Court of Human Rights, administrative adjudication even of certain matters qualified 'criminal' within the meaning of Article 6 of the ECHR is ⁵⁶ Point 24 of the Commission Notice on the non-imposition or reduction of fines in cartel cases, OJ C 207, 18.07.1996, p. 4-6.

⁶⁰ Article 230 EC and Article 31 of Regulation 1/2003.

⁶¹ Cf. Cases 209-215 and 218/78, Heintz van Landewyck SARL and others v Commission (FEDETAB), [1980] ECR 3125, para 81; Cases 100-103/80, Musique Diffusion Française and others v Commission, [1983] ECR 1825, para 7; Case T-11/89, Shell International Chemical Company v Commission, [1992] ECR II-757, para 39.

not incompatible with the Convention so long as the party concerned can bring any such decision affecting it before a judicial body that has full jurisdiction, including the power to quash in all respects, on questions of fact and law, the challenged decision.⁶²

57. Notwithstanding the legality and efficiency of the current procedure, the Commission notes that in this context various respondents have discussed the possibility of strengthening the role of the Hearing Officer with a view to ensure procedural fairness, transparency and independent (peer) review of evidence.
58. Regulation 1/2003 provides the Commission with a set of specific powers to ensure effective enforcement action. The procedural tools have to a large extent been developed from the earlier Regulation 17 and the case law based thereon. This concerns in particular the Commission's investigation and fining powers. The types of decisions were revised in light of the direct application of Article 81(3) EC. The Commission continuously refines its policy and develops new ways of enhancing enforcement within the framework of the Regulation.⁶³
59. The present chapter is intended to reflect how the Commission has used the new or more developed instruments of the Regulation, taking into account that some instruments have been used more often than others. The Report identifies certain limited areas in which there appear to be efficiency reserves that the current legal framework and/or practice do not fully exploit and that may merit further reflection.

3.2. The Commission's increased investigative powers

3.2.1. Introduction

60. Chapter V of Regulation 1/2003 lays down the Commission's formal powers of investigation. As in Regulation 17, the principal powers are requests for information and inspections. Regulation 1/2003 essentially reinforced both of them, by introducing the power to adopt decisions immediately pursuant to Article 18(3), the power to carry out inspections in non-business premises, the power to affix seals in business premises and the power to ask oral questions on facts or documents relating to the subject-matter and purpose of an inspection and to record the answers. Moreover, Regulation 1/2003 provides for the possibility to impose fines if seals have been broken or incorrect or misleading answers have been given. In addition to these compulsory measures, the Regulation also introduced the power to interview legal and natural persons with their consent. In the framework of pro-active enforcement, the powers of investigation have gained in importance.

3.2.2. Sector inquiries

61. Article 17 of Regulation 1/2003 has substituted Article 12 of Regulation 17. It enables the Commission to undertake inquiries into sectors of the economy where there are indications to suggest that competition is being restricted or distorted in an economic sector of the common market. It also empowers the Commission to carry out inquiries into types of agreements.⁶⁴

⁶² See in this context Bendenoun v France, Judgment of the ECtHR of 24 February 1994, para 46; Janosevic v Sweden, Judgment of the ECtHR of 23 July 2002, para 81.

62. Since the entry into force of Regulation 1/2003, sector inquiries have become one of the key investigative tools for the Commission, reflecting an increased scope for taking action in priority areas that are vital to Europe's citizens and where market information suggests that competition does not work as it should. The Commission uses this instrument to improve its in-depth knowledge about a sector with a view to better identifying its main shortcomings caused by market participants. It is therefore an 'upstream' exercise to potential antitrust proceedings in specific cases which may follow. A sector inquiry can in addition provide empirical evidence that may be useful in reviewing the regulatory framework governing a sector.
63. The Commission's experience of the sector inquiries conducted during the reporting period, into the media⁶⁵, gas and electricity⁶⁶, retail banking⁶⁷, business insurance⁶⁸ and pharmaceutical sectors⁶⁹ is very positive. Sector inquiries have enabled the Commission to identify shortcomings in the competitive process of the respective sectors under investigation and provided a wealth of factual material that have supported the Commission in carrying out more detailed assessments in individual cases.
64. In the energy sector, the inquiry responded to concerns voiced by consumers and new entrants in the sector about the development of wholesale gas and electricity markets and limited choice for consumers. After nearly two years of intensive investigation, the Commission identified in its final report⁷⁰ serious shortcomings in the electricity and gas markets, e.g. too much market concentration in most national markets, a lack of liquidity preventing successful new entry, too little integration between Member States' markets, an absence of transparent, available market information leading to distrust in the pricing mechanisms, an inadequate current level of unbundling between network and supply interests which has negative repercussions on market functioning and investment incentives, customers being tied to suppliers through long-term downstream contracts, and current balancing markets and small balancing zones which limit competition and thereby ease costs for the final consumer. As a follow-up, the Commission launched a number of investigations under the EC Treaty rules, notably Article 82 EC, in the electricity and gas markets. Whereas several cases are still ongoing, the Commission has already adopted a landmark decision concerning two cases in the electricity sector.⁷¹ On the basis of ⁶⁴ No such inquiry into types of agreements has been conducted in the reporting period.

unprecedented structural commitments addressing horizontal and vertical concerns, this decision is expected to open two separate markets to competition. In another key case in the gas sector⁷², an undertaking has also provided structural commitments to bring the investigation to an end. The in-depth knowledge of the energy market which the Commission gained in the course of the sector inquiry has also served for reviewing the regulatory framework for energy liberalisation.⁷³

65. The sector inquiry into the retail banking sector found a number of competition concerns in the markets for payment cards, payment systems and retail banking products, e.g. highly concentrated markets in many Member States, large variations in merchant fees across the EU, large variations in interchange fees between banks across the EU, high and sustained profitability particularly in card issuing and divergent technical standards.⁷⁴ The impact of the inquiry on the retail banking market is multifaceted: the sector inquiry findings lent support to existing enforcement cases, in particular in the payment cards area. New areas of investigation have emerged, both for the Commission and for national competition authorities. Already after the publication of its interim report on payment cards and systems, the Commission met banks in some Member States⁷⁵ to discuss where self regulation could address competition concerns and several market players have taken steps to address the Commission's concerns. Several of the market barriers highlighted by the sector inquiry are addressed in the context of the discussions on SEPA (Single Euro Payments Area).⁷⁶ Moreover, the knowledge of the market obtained in the course of the sector inquiry contributes to other Commission initiatives than competition law enforcement.⁷⁷
66. The business insurance sector inquiry identified concerns about the operation of two areas of business insurance. Firstly, it highlighted long-standing and widespread industry practices in the reinsurance and coinsurance markets involving the alignment of premiums, which may lead to higher prices for large risk commercial insurance. The report left open the question of whether these constitute infringements of the prohibition on restrictive business practices (Article 81 EC), but invited industry either to justify the business practices concerned under the competition rules or to reform them. Secondly, the Commission also confirmed its concerns as to transparency of remuneration and conflicts of interest in insurance brokerage which may inflate prices and reduce choice, in particular for SMEs. This issue will be further explored in the context of the review of the Insurance Mediation Directive 2002/92/EC. Finally, the sector inquiry has also provided useful data which will be fed into the review of the Insurance Block Exemption Regulation⁷⁸, a report on the functioning of which was adopted by the Commission on 24 March 2009.⁷⁹

67. The most recent sector inquiry was launched on 15 January 2008 into the pharmaceutical sector relating to the introduction of innovative and generic medicines for human consumption onto the market. The inquiry was launched in response to indications that fewer new medicines were brought to market and the entry of generic medicines seemed to be delayed. The preliminary findings presented on 28 November 2008⁸⁰ suggest that there is evidence that originator companies have engaged in practices with the objective of delaying or blocking market entry of competing medicines. It seems that such practices vis-à-vis generic companies include multiple patent applications for the same medicine (so-called patent clusters), initiation of disputes and litigation, conclusion of patent settlements which constrain market entry of generic companies and interventions before national authorities when generic companies ask for regulatory approvals. The preliminary findings also indicate that, where successful, these practices result in significant additional costs for public health budgets – and ultimately taxpayers and patients – and reduce incentives to innovate.⁸¹ The preliminary findings also suggest that companies applied defensive patenting strategies, primarily aimed at blocking competitors in the development of new medicines. The Commission will publish a final report in summer 2009.
68. Article 17 of Regulation 1/2003 enables the Commission to exercise its investigative powers under Articles 18, 19, 20 and 22 of Regulation 1/2003 in the context of a sector inquiry. The pharmaceutical sector inquiry is the first Commission sector inquiry that has been started with unannounced inspections at the premises of a number of originator and generic pharmaceutical companies. Unannounced inspections are organised notably to prevent the risk of documentation relating to possible anti-competitive practices being concealed, withheld or destroyed if other investigative means are used. In this particular inquiry, the kind of information the Commission examined, notably concerning the use of intellectual property rights, litigation and settlement agreements covering the EU, is by its nature highly confidential. Such information may also be easily withheld, concealed or destroyed. For these reasons, the Commission decided that immediate access to all such information was necessary. The knowledge acquired by the Commission during the sector inquiry has allowed the Commission to identify various competition concerns and to launch individual investigations. On this basis further unannounced inspections were organised at several pharmaceutical companies on 24 November 2008.⁸²

⁸² See Commission Press Release, IP/08/734 of 24 November 2008.

69. Respondents to the stakeholder consultation have criticised the use of inspections in the context of a sector inquiry. However, the power to conduct sector inquiries in the Regulation is a genuine investigation power aimed at effective enforcement. It therefore includes the right to conduct inspections under Article 20 which are necessary for carrying out the sector inquiry concerned. The use of inspections in a particular sector inquiry is carefully assessed by the Commission and depends on the circumstances of the individual inquiry and notably on the type of information the Commission needs for its investigation. Similarly, stakeholders have raised the scope of questionnaires addressed to undertakings in the context of sector inquiries. The Commission recognises that replies to information requests can be resource and time-intensive, however, it considers that it does not go beyond what is necessary to fully understand the markets concerned and the relationships between the market players. Without this key data, the findings of the sector inquiries would be less robust and could lead to erroneous or distorted conclusions by the Commission.

3.2.3. Inspections in business premises

70. Unannounced inspections in business premises have always been the Commission's most important tool in its fight against cartels and other anticompetitive behaviour. Already provided for by Regulation 17, these powers have been reinforced by Regulation 1/2003 and further enhanced by new provisions which are set out in more detail below. Between 1 May 2004 and the end of 2008, the Commission conducted 29 inspections in cartel cases. It also undertook inspections in the framework of the pharmaceutical sector inquiry and other antitrust cases.
71. The Community Courts in *Hoechst*⁸³, *Roquette*⁸⁴, and more recently in *France Télécom*⁸⁵, have confirmed the powers of investigation conferred on the Commission by Regulation 17 and now by Regulation 1/2003.
72. Article 20(2)(d) of Regulation 1/2003 confers on Commission inspectors the power to seal premises, books and records insofar as it is necessary for the inspection. It permits a more extensive inspection to be conducted without the risk that documents will be removed. Seals have been regularly used during inspections since 2004. They are particularly useful when a considerable number of offices need to be inspected, numerous documents are found which cannot all be copied and registered in one day and when Forensic IT is used which often requires overnight scanning of IT files. Pursuant to Article 23(1)(e) of the Regulation breaching the seals affixed by the Commission may lead to a fine of up to 1% of the annual turnover of the undertaking.⁸⁶
73. Article 20(2)(e) empowers the Commission during inspections in business premises to "ask any representative or member of staff of the undertaking or association of undertakings for explanations of facts or documents relating to the subject-matter and purpose of the inspection and to record the answers". Failure to comply can attract fines and/or periodic penalty payments on the company in accordance with Articles 23 and 24. The power to ask questions has been a successful instrument in

Commission inspections in the last five years. In particular, in complex cartel cases where cartel members acted in a very sophisticated way to hide any traces of their unlawful conduct, factual questions to staff members have enabled the Commission to obtain access to relevant information.⁸⁷

3.2.4. Commission inspections in non-business premises

74. The most significant extension of the Commission investigation powers was introduced by Article 21 of Regulation 1/2003 in the form of inspections in other than business premises, including for instance the homes of directors, managers and other members of staff of the undertakings and associations of undertakings concerned. This power can only be exercised by Commission decision and requires a reasonable suspicion that books or other records relating to the business and to the subject-matter of the inspection, which may be relevant to prove a serious violation of Article 81 EC or Article 82 EC, are kept there. Given the serious intrusion into private life, such inspections can only be executed with prior judicial authorisation.⁸⁸
75. The first inspection of private premises took place in the context of the marine hose cartel investigation. In May 2007, Commission inspectors carried out an inspection of the premises of several marine hose producers in France, Italy and the United Kingdom.⁸⁹ Simultaneously a Commission team inspected the private premises of a director of one of the undertakings concerned in the UK. The evidence found in the course of these inspections and in particular in the private premises enabled the Commission to fine the marine hose producers involved € 131 million for market sharing and price-fixing cartel in January 2009.⁹⁰ This first successful experience has proven that the new investigation tool introduced by Article 21 is very important for the Commission in its fight against cartels which have become more and more complex and where efforts to hide evidence of forbidden activities have significantly increased during the last years. Another inspection in private premises has taken place in 2008.⁹¹

3.2.5. Legal professional privilege

76. The principle of legal privilege as an unwritten limitation of the Commission's power to inspect was recognised by the Court of Justice in the *AM&S*⁹² case. The question of an extension of legal privilege to in-house lawyers had been argued by certain proponents at the time of the adoption of Regulation 1/2003 and was raised anew in the public consultation for the Report.

⁹² Case 155/79 AM&S [1982] ECR 1575; see also Case T-30-89 Hilti [1990] ECR II-163, para 18.

77. In *Akzo*⁹³ the Court of First Instance recently confirmed the AM&S jurisprudence, upholding a uniform European standard for legal privilege in Commission inspections and providing clarifications about the material and personal scope of the privilege rule and about the procedure to be followed when dealing with contested claims of legal privilege during inspections.⁹⁴
78. The Court of First Instance rejected legal privilege for lawyers who are in a relationship of employment with a company other than a law firm (in-house lawyers), relying notably on the lack of structural independence inherent to their position. It expressly rejected the argument that the abolition of the notification system and the ensuing extended need for self-assessment pleaded for an extension of legal privilege.⁹⁵ Moreover, the Court of First Instance held that the evolution of national legislation which had been alleged by the applicants does not support a general finding that in-house lawyers should be covered by legal privilege.⁹⁶ The question of legal privilege for in-house lawyers is further pending before the Court of Justice following the appeal of the Akzo judgment.⁹⁷

3.2.6. Inspections by national competition authorities at the request of the Commission

79. Article 22 of Regulation 1/2003 is based on former Article 13 of Regulation 17 and has been adapted to the new enforcement system. It enables national competition authorities to carry out inspections or other fact-finding measures on their territory on behalf and for the account of another competition authority (paragraph 1)⁹⁸ and inspections upon request by the Commission (paragraph 2). In both cases, Article 22 inspections are carried out in accordance with the national law of the Member State where the inspection or fact-finding measure takes place. The assisting authority may use all investigative tools at its disposal independently of the fact that they may differ from the investigative tools at the disposal of the requesting authority.
80. As was the case in Regulation 17, national competition authorities are obliged to carry out an inspection where the Commission requests it. The Commission has used this provision in the context of the Flat glass investigation in France and in Germany in February 2005.⁹⁹ It is potentially useful, in particular in investigations where a rather large number of sites need to be inspected simultaneously and the Commission would otherwise not be able to cover all inspection sites. Nevertheless, practical and legal issues have so far prevented extensive use of this provision. Inter alia, Article 22(2) tends to import the differences in procedures in the Member States into Commission procedures. Uncertainties have occasionally also arisen with regard to whether the transfer of evidence should take place on the basis of Article 12 or Article 22, but to date this has been satisfactorily resolved. Further reflection on a possible clarification of the provision may be appropriate with a view to improve the effectiveness of this tool.

⁹⁴ Legal professional privilege covers also preparatory documents even if they were not exchanged with a lawyer or were not created for the purpose of being sent physically to a lawyer, provided that they were drawn up exclusively for the purpose of seeking legal advice from a lawyer in exercise of the rights of defence. The mere fact that a document has been discussed with a lawyer is not sufficient to give it such protection (para 123 of the judgment).

3.2.7. Requests for information

81. Article 18 of Regulation 1/2003 gives the Commission the power to obtain all necessary information from undertakings. This power can be used at any stage in the Commission's procedure and is not limited to the fact-finding stage. It continues to be of high importance to the Commission, as obtaining such information enables it to develop a full analysis of the markets concerned. Article 11 of Regulation 17 foresaw a two-stage procedure whereby failure to respond to a simple request was a prerequisite to a request by decision which obliges the addressee to reply. Under Article 18 of Regulation 1/2003, the Commission has the choice to issue either a simple request or to proceed immediately to a decision requiring that information be provided.
82. Articles 23(1) and 24(1) provide for fines and periodic penalty payments in the context of requests for information¹⁰⁰ and the availability of these measures has improved the effectiveness of requests for information. Nonetheless, experience of the last years has shown that in many instances replies to simple requests were incomplete and/or were provided late. In the context of certain sector inquiries especially this was a mass phenomenon. Against this background, the Commission may consider more often using decisions pursuant to Article 18(3), as foreseen in Regulation 1/2003.

3.2.8. Voluntary Interviews

83. Article 19 empowers the Commission to interview any natural or legal person who consents to be interviewed for the purpose of collecting information relating to the subject-matter of an investigation. Article 3 of Commission Regulation 773/2004 sets out further detail in this regard. The possibility to conduct an interview pursuant to Article 19 has to be distinguished from the right of the Commission to ask oral questions during on-site inspections pursuant to Article 20(2)(e) and to impose sanctions on the undertaking concerned in case of incorrect or misleading answers.
84. Interviews pursuant to Article 19 can be carried out in all investigations relating to a possible violation of Articles 81 and 82 EC. The Commission has used this instrument regularly in the last years. Experience has shown that the absence of penalties for misleading or false replies may be a disincentive to provide correct and complete statements. It should be further reflected whether the effectiveness of this tool can be improved.

3.3. Types of Commission Decisions in the new enforcement system

85. Regulation 1/2003 equipped the Commission with a renewed set of types of decision that is geared towards the principal objectives of the Regulation, effective and coherent enforcement. Chapter III of the Regulation provides for Commission decisions concerning the finding and termination of an infringement (Article 7), interim measures (Article 8), commitments (Article 9) and a finding of inapplicability (Article 10). In the Commission's decision making practice during the reporting period, prohibition decisions pursuant to Article 7 and commitment decisions pursuant to Article 9 have been the most relevant tools.¹⁰¹

¹⁰⁰ See below, parts 3.5.6 and 3.5.7.

3.3.1. Prohibition decisions (Article 7)

86. Article 7(1) of Regulation 1/2003 in the first place empowers the Commission to find an infringement and order the undertakings concerned to bring it to an end. Article 7 has been developed from Article 3 of the now superseded Regulation 17. During the first five years of Regulation 1/2003, the Commission has adopted prohibition decisions with or without fines¹⁰² in a series of high-profile cases in sectors identified for priority enforcement. Several of these decisions – besides their impact on the conduct of the undertakings concerned – clarified the conditions for prohibition and thereby gave a signal to other undertakings and other enforcers.
87. Already shortly before the entry into effect of Regulation 1/2003, the Commission had adopted its decision imposing a fine of €497 million on *Microsoft*¹⁰³ for abuse of dominant position in the PC operating system market by refusing to disclose interoperability information that would enable its competitors to fully interoperate with Windows PCs and servers and by tying Windows Media Player with its dominant Windows PC operating system.
88. Throughout the reporting period, a number of Commission decisions have addressed complex cases in important sectors. Many of these decisions at the same time provided significant precedential value for national competition authorities' enforcement activity in various sectors. For instance, the Commission Decision of 4 July 2007 imposing fines on the Spanish incumbent telecoms operator *Telefónica*¹⁰⁴ for abuse of its dominant position in the Spanish broadband market confirmed the Commission's methodology for the analysis of margin squeeze and provided guidance to national competition authorities in similar scenarios. In *MasterCard*¹⁰⁵ the Commission addressed the complex area of multilateral interchange fees (MIFs) for cross-border payment card transactions with MasterCard and Maestro branded debit and consumer credit cards. The Commission case is at the centre of a cluster of enforcement actions by national competition authorities dealing with domestic payment transactions.¹⁰⁶ Similarly, already in 2004, the Commission adopted its decision in the *Belgian Architects*¹⁰⁷ case which – together with further horizontal work in the context of the ECN – has given an impulse for enforcement action by national competition authorities in numerous cases in the field of professional services.¹⁰⁸

89. Cartels are the largest category of infringements in which decisions have been adopted under Article 7. Within the reporting period many important cartels have been investigated and fined. High profile cases were, for instance, the *Car glass cartel*¹⁰⁹ where the Commission imposed the highest fines ever¹¹⁰, both for an individual company and for a cartel as a whole, on four producers of car glass for illegal market-sharing and exchange of commercially sensitive information. In the *Paraffin wax case*¹¹¹ nine big producers of paraffin waxes used in a variety of products such as candles were fined for their participation in a price-fixing and market-sharing cartel which had lasted from 1992 until 2005. Another decision of major importance concerned the *Elevators and Escalators cartel*¹¹² where four companies had run an illegal bid-rigging, price-fixing and market-sharing cartel in Belgium, Germany, Luxembourg and The Netherlands between 1995 and 2004.
90. The Commission's policy of addressing decisions to both the entities actively involved in the cartel activities and their parent or other companies exercising decisive influence over them has been largely confirmed by the Court of First Instance.¹¹³ Moreover, in *AC Treuhand*¹¹⁴ the CFI confirmed the Commission's decision to pursue and fine for the first time ever a third party, the consultancy AC Treuhand, which was found to have contributed actively and intentionally to the cartel in the sector of organic peroxides.
91. Already in the context of Article 3 of Regulation 17, the European Court of Justice had confirmed that the Commission has the power to order the parties to take positive measures to bring an infringement to an end.¹¹⁵ Article 7(1) of Regulation 1/2003 now explicitly provides that the Commission may impose any behavioural or structural remedies which are proportionate to the infringement committed and necessary to bring the infringement effectively to an end. Structural remedies can only be imposed either where there is no equally effective behavioural remedy or where any equally effective behavioural remedy would be more burdensome for the undertaking concerned than the structural remedy. Recital 12 further specifies that changes to the structure of an undertaking ("break-ups") would only be proportionate where there is a substantial risk of a lasting or repeated infringement that derives from the very structure of the undertaking.

92. The Commission has not so far imposed structural remedies in prohibition decisions under Article 7(1). The power to impose structural remedies under Article 7(1) has, nevertheless, positively contributed to the obtaining of structural changes as commitments under Article 9.¹¹⁶
93. Regulation 1/2003 also codified the case law of the Court in *GVL*¹¹⁷ according to which the Commission, where it has a legitimate interest, may, in principle, find that an infringement has been committed in the past, i.e. where such infringement has already come to an end, and without thus issuing a cease and desist order. The Court of First Instance gave a strict interpretation to the notion of "legitimate interest" in *Sumitomo*¹¹⁸, implying that the Commission must substantiate, in light of the facts of each individual case, the reasons why it considers that the condition of legitimate interest is satisfied (e.g. a specific risk of recidivism on the part of the undertakings concerned). In the reporting period, the Commission considered this possibility only in a few cases¹¹⁹, as its priorities are focused on pursuing the most serious on-going infringements.

3.3.2. Commitment decisions (Article 9)

94. Article 9 of Regulation 1/2003 empowers the Commission to adopt a new type of decision by which it may make commitments offered by undertakings binding and enforceable on them ("commitment decisions"). Commitment decisions are based on commitments voluntarily offered by the party or parties concerned and thus allow the Commission and the parties to conclude cases in a more consensual mode. Commitment decisions do not make a finding of an infringement, nor do they conclude that an infringement would be terminated as a consequence of the commitments. Article 9 adds considerable value in comparison to Regulation 17, under which no enforcement possibility was available for cases concluded by informal commitments. The primary purpose of commitment decisions is to preserve effective competition and to obtain faster changes in the market for the future. It is therefore used in cases in which the Commission considers that the commitments, if subsequently fully respected by the undertaking, sufficiently address its competition concerns.
95. According to Recital 13 of Regulation 1/2003, commitment decisions are not, in principle, appropriate in cases in which the Commission intends to impose a fine. For instance, in hard-core cartel cases fines are necessary, as the emphasis of enforcement is on punishing past behaviour and deterring anti-competitive practices. In other cases, the Commission has a margin of discretion in the choice offered to it under Regulation 1/2003, i.e. to make commitments binding through the adoption of a decision under Article 9 or to pursue the case under Article 7, involving a finding of an infringement.¹²⁰

96. The Commission has so far adopted 13 decisions under Article 9, relating to a variety of matters about which competition concerns were expressed under both Articles 81 and 82 EC.¹²¹
97. The Coca-Cola, De Beers Distrigaz, and RWE involved concerns relating to possible exclusionary abuses of dominant position under Article 82 EC, the two E.ON cases involved concerns relating to possible exploitative abuses of a dominant position under Article 82 EC, and the DFB, FA Premier League, Repsol, Cannes Extension Agreement, Opel, Toyota, Fiat and Daimler Chrysler cases raised concerns under Article 81 EC. Whilst most Article 81 cases involved vertical agreements with exclusivity clauses or conditions of supply to third parties, the cases DFB, FA Premier League and the Cannes Extension Agreement concerned horizontal agreements. Except for E.ON and RWE, in which the Commission made structural commitments binding on the undertaking, all the commitments have been behavioural in nature. In sectors where a number of infringements derive from the very complex nature of business decisions (e.g. decisions taken on an hourly or finer basis for a large portfolio of assets and/or using a large number of non-programmable parameters) and from the structure (e.g. vertical integration) of the operators, structural measures may indeed be necessary.
98. On 11 October 2007, the Commission accepted commitments offered by Distrigaz to open the Belgian gas market by reducing the gas volumes tied in long-term contracts and thus allowing other gas suppliers to compete with Distrigaz and to build up a portfolio of customers.¹²² On 26th November 2008, the Commission accepted the commitments offered by E.ON to open the German electricity markets to competition and bring to an end two separate investigations.¹²³ In the first case, the Commission had concerns that E.ON may have withdrawn available generation capacity from the German wholesale electricity markets in order to raise prices, and may have deterred investments in energy generation by competitors. In the second case, the Commission had concerns that the transmission subsidiary of E.ON may have favoured its production affiliate for providing balancing services, while passing the resulting costs on to final consumers, and may have prevented power producers from other Member States from exporting balancing energy into its transmission zone. Subsequently, E.ON offered to divest around 5 000 MW of its generation capacity to address the concerns regarding the wholesale market. E.ON also committed to divest its extra-high voltage network to meet the concerns on the electricity balancing market. The Commission has also recently accepted structural commitments proposed by RWE in the German gas market¹²⁴ The Commission had concerns that RWE may have abused its dominant position on the gas transmission market, notably by means of its refusal to supply gas transmission services to third parties and by trying to lower the profit margins of its downstream competitors in gas supply. To address these concerns, RWE committed to divest its existing Western German high-pressure transmission network to an independent purchaser, the acquisition by whom would not give rise to prima facie competition concerns. The Commission will closely monitor compliance with these commitments.

99. Article 9 pursues the objective of enhancing efficiency and effectiveness in dealing with competition concerns identified by the Commission where the undertaking(s) concerned voluntarily offer commitments with a view to address these concerns. The choice of an Article 9 proceeding is thus often guided by considerations of expediency, as the procedure normally allows saving administrative and investigative resources that would be required in an Article 7 procedure, as well as considerations about the effectiveness of commitments proposed for solving market problems expeditiously.
100. Article 9 requires that the Commission expresses its competition concerns in a preliminary assessment vis-à-vis the undertaking(s) concerned. The preliminary assessment principally creates the opportunity for the Commission to make its competition concerns known to the parties at an earlier stage of the proceedings with a view to open commitment discussions. The preliminary assessment does therefore not need to have the level of detail required for a statement of objections, which produces procedural efficiencies.
101. Article 27 (4) of Regulation 1/2003 provides for a market test inviting interested third parties to submit their observations within a fixed time limit, before the commitments can be finally accepted. To this end, the Commission is obliged to publish in the Official Journal a concise summary of the case and the main content of the commitments.¹²⁵
102. Experience so far indicates that the instrument of commitment decisions has functioned well and has in several cases served as an effective means to address the competition problems at issue. As commitment decisions result from the parties' initiative and willingness to offer commitments, the same parties tend to be more readily inclined to implement their own voluntary commitments. Commitment decisions are also less likely to be challenged before the Community Courts than prohibition decisions. Indeed, thus far few commitment decisions adopted by the Commission have been subject to appeal at the Court of First Instance by third parties directly affected by the decision.¹²⁶ Consequently, Article 9 decisions have helped to expedite market changes. Through the lesser litigation burden and other procedural economies, Article 9 has therefore also contributed favourably to the resource allocation within the Directorate General for Competition, freeing resources for the prosecution and punishment of the most serious infringements.
103. Notwithstanding, in Alrosa, the Court of First Instance annulled the Commission Decision 2006/520/EC of 22 February 2006 (De Beers), for breach of the principle of proportionality and the right to be heard. The Court in particular considered that, according to the principle of proportionality, commitments made binding on the basis of Article 9 must be strictly aligned on remedies that the Commission could have imposed in a proceeding under Article 7, thereby requiring a parallel analysis independent of the commitments offered by the party/ies concerned. The judgment of the Court of First Instance is currently under appeal to the Court of Justice.¹²⁷

¹²⁵ In this regard, see also Case T-170/06, Alrosa v. Commission [2007] ECR II-2601, para 196.

¹²⁶ In Case T-170/06, Alrosa v. Commission the Court of First Instance annulled the Commission Decision 2006/520/EC of 22 February 2006 (De Beers).

104. Furthermore, there is a perception that the overall duration of the administrative proceedings in certain cases decided under Article 9 was relatively long and did thus not fully yield the efficiencies pursued by the Regulation. In this context, it can be highlighted that the majority of cases decided under Article 9 so far had been started under Regulation 17 and thus entered the commitment route after May 2004 (i.e. cases DFB, Distrigaz, De Beers, Coca-Cola, FA Premier League, Repsol, Cannes Extension Agreement). This case experience illustrates generally that a late switch from the prohibition to the commitment route may entail significant delays in the procedure, ranging from nearly four years (De Beers, Cannes Extension Agreement) to around seven years (DFB, Distrigaz). Even though in cases in which a statement of objections has been issued, from a procedural perspective, the requirement of the preliminary assessment is fulfilled, a market test under Article 27(4) is still necessary. In most of these cases, the difficulty in arriving at a satisfactory outcome on substance has led to relatively prolonged discussions with parties before it was possible for the Commission to accept commitments. The procedure has generally been shorter in cases which followed the entry into force of Regulation 1/2003. The car cases took less than three years each, whereas the E.ON cases were concluded in a comparatively limited time-span of less than two years.
105. It is also noted that the commitment procedures, as retained by some of the legislators of the Member States for the national competition authorities, differ from the Commission procedure.

3.3.3. Effects of commitment decisions

106. Feedback from the legal and business communities pointed to a certain number of queries about the effects of commitment decisions, including notably the issue of enforcement action by national competition authorities in relation to competition concerns covered by a Commission commitment decision. The Commission's experience has also shown that the possibility for the national authorities to bring cases relating to the same subject matter may complicate negotiations on commitments in some cases.
107. Recitals 13 and 22 specify that commitment decisions are without prejudice to the powers of national competition authorities and courts to find an infringement and decide upon the case. National authorities may thus in principle adopt a prohibition decision regardless of the Commission's commitment decision concerning the same subject matter. Moreover, Article 16 of Regulation 1/2003, according to which national competition authorities and courts must not adopt decisions that run counter to those adopted by the Commission, does not appear to preclude such a finding.¹²⁸

¹²⁸ The position could arguably be different where a national competition authority or a national court requires an undertaking to carry out actions that conflict with the commitments made binding by the Commission decision, i.e. where the undertaking could not implement the obligations imposed by national authorities without breaching its commitments. It has been argued in doctrine that this scenario

The finding of an infringement is not in conflict with a Commission decision that limits itself to concluding that there are no longer grounds for action on the part of the Commission.¹²⁹ This corresponds to the overall thrust of the Regulation which expressly differentiates commitment decisions from the former exemption decisions which had a blocking effect on national competition authorities and courts.

108. In the context of public enforcement, the matter has, however, rarely arisen in practice. One such instance arose in the Coca-Cola case, where certain national competition authorities conducted parallel proceedings which were closed after the Commission's commitment decision of 2005.¹³⁰ The Greek competition authority, in turn, had adopted a prohibition decision against Coca Cola under Greek competition law in 2002 and imposed periodic penalty payments for non-compliance with that decision in 2006¹³¹, i.e. after the Commission had adopted its commitment decision. The approach of the national competition authority did not conflict with the Commission's commitment decision and could be implemented by the undertaking concerned on the local market. Generally, the Commission strives in commitment cases to address the competition concerns in such a way that parallel enforcement action by the national competition authorities within the territorial coverage of the Commission decision should in principle not be needed.
109. A different question is to which extent commitment decisions, notwithstanding their limited legal effects on other enforcers, can serve as a model for addressing similar situations. The Commission's commitment practice has been seen as acting in this way in several instances. In Distrigaz, for instance, the decision under Article 9 set out guidance on the Commission's approach toward foreclosure by long term contracts. Similarly, following the commitment decisions adopted by the Commission in the four car cases (see table in the annex), Citroën offered commitments in the context of a French procedure which also related to technical information.¹³² Moreover, in the area of marketing of media rights for sports events, the Commission has, after adopting commitment decisions in the cases DFB and FA Premier League, considered that further action in this field should not be a priority for it as the existing commitment decisions appeared to provide sufficient orientation to operators and national competition authorities to deal with domestic media markets effectively and consistently.

3.3.4. Interim Measures (Article 8)

110. Article 8(1) of Regulation 1/2003 provides that in cases of urgency due to the risk of serious and irreparable harm to competition, the Commission, acting on its own initiative, may order interim measures by decision, on the basis of a prima facie would attract the application of Article 16. See e.g. Gippini-Fournier, E. The Modernisation of European Competition Law: First Experiences with Regulation 1/2003, in FIDE XXIII Congress Linz 2008, Congress Publications Vol. 2, p. 404. Article 16 codifies the judgment of the Court of Justice in Case C-344/98 Masterfoods [2000] ECR I-11369, in which the Court of Justice held that the national competition authorities and courts cannot adopt decisions that run counter to decisions adopted by the Commission.

¹³⁰ The Spanish competition authority closed its proceedings on 15 July 2005.

¹³¹ See Decisions of the Hellenic Competition Commission 207/III/2002 and 309/V/2006, and Press Release of 14.06.2006, available at: http://www.epant.gr/news_details.php?Lang=en&id=89&nid=59.

finding of infringement. While Regulation 17 did not explicitly provide for interim measures, the European Court of Justice had held that the Commission had the power to impose such measures.¹³³

111. Interim measures can only be adopted where there is a risk of serious and irreparable harm to competition, not only to an individual undertaking or a competitor. The purpose of Articles 81 and 82 EC is indeed to protect competition in the market, and the Commission, as a competition authority, acts in the public interest to protect competition, whereas national courts are considered better placed to protect the interests of individual companies.¹³⁴ Against this background, the Commission has not made use of Article 8 in its decisional practice during the reporting period.

3.3.5. Finding of inapplicability (Article 10)

112. Another new type of decision is introduced by Article 10 of Regulation 1/2003 which empowers the Commission to adopt decisions finding that an agreement or practice does not infringe Article 81 or 82 EC, where the Community public interest so requires. The Commission, acting on its own initiative, may by decision find that Article 81 EC is not applicable in a certain case, either because the conditions of Article 81(1) EC are not fulfilled or because the conditions of Article 81(3) EC are satisfied. The Commission may likewise make such a finding with reference to Article 82 EC. The Commission has the exclusive power to adopt such decisions which are binding on national competition authorities and national courts.
113. The Commission has not, to date, adopted any decisions under Article 10. It has been stated by some stakeholders that greater legal certainty would be guaranteed if the Commission were to adopt decisions under Article 10 of Regulation 1/2003. However, this view disregards the purpose of Article 10 as defined by the Regulation. The use of the term "Community public interest" in Article 10 excludes the adoption of such decisions in the interests of individual companies, to avoid this instrument being used as a replacement for the exemption decision under the old system. The terms of application of Article 10 have been clearly defined so that its use is confined to "exceptional cases"¹³⁵ to clarify the law and ensure its consistent application throughout the Community, namely: (i) to "correct" the approach of a national competition authority; or (ii) to send a signal to the ECN about how to approach a certain case.
114. In practice, however, such an ex ante means of ensuring consistency has largely been overtaken by the extensive efforts of the ECN in promoting the coherent application of the EC antitrust rules. The extent to which the ECN has proven to be a successful forum to discuss general policy issues was not anticipated at the time of the adoption of Regulation 1/2003. Horizontal working groups and sector-specific subgroups have been set up where the case-handlers of the different authorities have been extremely proactive in exchanging views and learning from each others' experiences with particular issues or with particular sectors. Against this background, the Commission has had no reasons to proceed under Article 10 to date.

3.4. Handling of complaints

3.4.1. General

115. Regulation 1/2003 has taken over from Regulation 17 the possibility for persons that are able to show a legitimate interest to be (formal) complainants that enjoy certain procedural rights.¹³⁶ The details of the procedure to be followed are set out in Commission Regulation 773/2004¹³⁷ and in the Commission Notice on the handling of complaints by the Commission under Articles 81 and 82 EC.¹³⁸ The handling of complaints is further governed by case law of the Community Courts.

116. Complaints are an important tool to trigger cases. Complainants often provide information which is indispensable for the investigation of an anti-competitive conduct as they are close to the facts. Experience has shown that, in particular in non-cartel cases for which leniency is not available, complaints are an important tool to discover anti-competitive conduct. Most prominent examples in the field of Article 82 EC are the Microsoft and Telefonica investigations.¹³⁹ In the area of Article 81 EC complainants have also provided valuable information.¹⁴⁰

3.4.2. Non-priority complaints

117. A large number of complaints are not about competition issues that are enforcement priorities for the Commission and they are consequently not followed up by the Commission by an in-depth investigation. Under the current legal framework, these complaints nonetheless trigger an administrative procedure.

118. The entry into application of Regulation 1/2003 introduced the possibility to re-allocate cases to Member States' competition authorities and to reject complaints in a simplified procedure on the ground that one or several of the latter is or are dealing with a case.¹⁴¹ This mechanism is now well established within the ECN. Several cases have been re-allocated from the Commission to national competition authorities. It is applied to complaints that – while not a priority for the Commission – are prima facie worthwhile investigating by a national competition authority and that a national competition authority is interested in pursuing. Since 1 May 2004, the Commission rejected 29 complaints pursuant to Article 13 of Regulation 1/2003.¹⁴²

¹⁴² See Case T-153/06. The case was later withdrawn. See in this context also Case C-53/03, Syfait, [2005] ECR I-4609.

However, the majority of incoming complaints are complaints that do not give rise to any priority case, neither by the Commission nor by a national competition authority.

119. Besides Article 13 of Regulation 1/2003, the Commission may reject an antitrust complaint on substance or for lack of Community interest. The Community Courts¹⁴³ have recognised that the Commission is entitled to give differing degrees of priority to the complaints that it receives and that it may rely on this concept for rejecting complaints. Since Regulation 1/2003 was intended to enable the Commission to focus on prosecuting the most serious infringements, complaints have been increasingly rejected for lack of Community interest.
120. The Commission has made public a list of criteria which it intends to use when examining whether or not complaints show sufficient Community interest. The criteria were published in the Annual Report on Competition Policy 2005 adopted in June 2006.¹⁴⁴ Experience gained during the last years has shown that these measures have contributed to better focusing the enforcement resources of the Commission on priority case investigations.

3.4.3. Involvement of complainants in priority cases

121. Where the Commission is acting on the basis of a complaint in view of the adoption of a prohibition decision¹⁴⁵, complainants are associated closely with the proceedings.¹⁴⁶ The precise procedural rights are set out in Article 6 of Regulation 773/2004 which notably foresees that the complainant shall be provided with a copy of the non-confidential version of the statement of objections. The procedure is different in case of a settlement procedure.¹⁴⁷
122. In many cases, complaints received in the course of an already ongoing procedure can be very useful for the investigation. The outcome and duration of an investigation may depend on the well-substantiated information provided by a complainant. In only a limited number of cases where complainants come forward at a very late stage of already advanced proceedings, the handling of such late complaints can lead to certain delays in the proceedings. In such cases, the Commission may suggest to potential complainants to consider rather the status of interested third person pursuant to Article 13 of Regulation 773/2004.
123. To conclude, the Commission considers that substantiated complaints are an important tool for the detection of anti-competitive conduct and have given rise to a number of priority cases. However, with regard to complaints that do not reveal priority case investigations, the Commission needs to examine further how the procedure may be streamlined.

¹⁴³ Cf. in particular Case T-24/90, Automec II, [1992] ECR II-2223 and Case C-119/97 P, Ufex, [1999], ECR I-1341.

3.5. Fines and periodic penalty payments

3.5.1. The Commission's power to impose fines

124. Regulation 1/2003 essentially took over from Regulation 17 the legal basis for imposing fines for breaches of the substantive competition rules. In accordance with Article 23(2), the Commission may impose fines on infringing undertakings and associations of undertakings that do not exceed 10% of their total turnover in the preceding business year. Fines with sufficient deterrent effect, coupled with an effective leniency program, constitute the most efficient weapon in the Commission's armoury to fight cartels. In particular, deterrent fines prevent companies from entering into cartel agreements and entice cartelists to blow the whistle on existing cartels in return for immunity or a reduced fine under the leniency notice.
125. The Commission's practice with regard to fines has been extensively raised in replies to the stakeholder consultation, mostly pointing to legal questions of principle. In this context, it is noteworthy that the Community Courts have reviewed a great number of fines imposed by the Commission and did not find the level of fines to be disproportionate or excessive. The Courts have also confirmed the legality of Article 15(2) of Regulation 17 as the legal basis for the Commission to impose fines for infringements of Community competition rules and have rejected objections of illegality raised by parties to proceedings in a constant series of rulings. In the recent Degussa case, the Court of First Instance and the Court of Justice confirmed that the absence of further precision as to the amount or method of calculation of fines in Article 15(2) of Regulation 17 (which set forth a ceiling on fines and criteria which allow to take into account the degree of illegality, namely the gravity and duration of the infringement) is not contrary to the principle of legality of penalties.¹⁴⁸ The case-law which concerns Article 15(2) of Regulation 17 is also pertinent for Article 23(2) of Regulation 1/2003 which replaced the former provision without any substantial changes. The Community Courts have also confirmed on various occasions the legality of the Commission's 1998 guidelines on the method of setting of fines.¹⁴⁹ Moreover, according to settled case-law, the proper application of the Community competition rules requires that the Commission may at any time adjust the level of fines to the needs of the Community competition policy, including an increase in the level of fines in individual cases or by adopting fining guidelines.¹⁵⁰ The Community Courts, while emphasising a wide discretion of the Commission in setting fines, have held that the Commission did not have an unlimited discretion. Article 15(2) of Regulation 17 (now Article 23(2) of Regulation 1/2003) itself limits the Commission's discretion and, in addition, the Commission is bound to comply with the general principles of law, in particular the principles of equal treatment and proportionality.¹⁵¹ Moreover, the Community Courts have unlimited jurisdiction to review Commission decisions, whereby it imposes fines (Article 229 EC and Article 31 of Regulation 1/2003).

3.5.2. New developments

126. During the reported period, the Commission has revised certain existing tools and searched for new instruments in order to improve the enforcement of competition rules, in particular for a more efficient and swifter fight against cartels. Existing tools were further developed taking into account experience in the past years, with the view of increasing transparency and providing more guidance to undertakings as well as to respond to realities. The aim of achieving procedural economies in order to be able to use resources for other cases also played a vital role in this development. These tools include, in particular, a revised Leniency Notice, revised Guidelines for setting fines and a new settlement procedure in cartel cases. They have to be seen in the overall framework of instruments under Regulation 1/2003, for they derive their legal basis from the Regulation and contribute to the implementation of competition rules.

3.5.3. The Guidelines on fines

127. On 28 June 2006, the Commission adopted new Guidelines¹⁵² on the method of setting fines to be imposed on companies that infringe Articles 81 and/or 82 EC. These Guidelines revise those adopted in 1998¹⁵³, with a view to increasing the deterrent effect of fines. The ceiling of 10% of the undertaking's total annual turnover remained unchanged in the reform from Regulation 17 to Regulation 1/2003. Within this limit, the revised Guidelines provide that fines may be based on up to 30% of the company's annual sales to which the infringement relates, multiplied by the number of years of participation in the infringement. In addition, a part of the fine, the so-called "entry fee", may be imposed irrespective of the duration of the infringement in order to increase deterrence. An additional increase for deterrence (the so-called "multiplier") may be applied to take into account a particularly large turnover of the undertaking beyond the sales related to the infringement.

3.5.4. The 2006 Leniency Notice

128. On 6 December 2006, the Commission adopted a revised Notice on immunity from fines and reduction of fines in cartel cases¹⁵⁴ (the "2006 Leniency Notice"). It is the third Commission leniency notice¹⁵⁵ and sets out the framework for rewarding cooperation in the Commission investigation by undertakings which are or have been party to secret cartels affecting the Community. It is a revised version of the preceding 2002 Leniency Notice, a successful instrument, which greatly contributed to detecting and putting an end to numerous cartels. It takes into account practice implementing the 2002 Leniency Notice and focuses on providing more guidance and increasing transparency.
129. In particular, the 2006 Leniency Notice clarifies what information and evidence an applicant needs to provide to the Commission to benefit from immunity from fines. It also clarifies the conditions for immunity and reduction of fines. Moreover, the 2006 Leniency Notice introduced a so-called marker system for immunity applicants. A marker protects an immunity applicant's place in the queue for a specified period in order to allow for the gathering of the necessary information and evidence required to meet the threshold for immunity from fines. The marker system is discretionary (the Commission services may grant a marker, where justified).
130. Since the 2006 Leniency Notice entered into force, the Commission has received, on average, two applications for immunity per month.
131. The leniency policy enhances investigative effectiveness by the voluntary collaboration of undertakings involved in cartels. As a reward, collaborating undertakings are granted immunity from fines (the first one to submit information and evidence about an alleged cartel, provided all requirements are met) or a reduction of a fine (for other undertakings that provide the Commission with evidence which has significant added value and meet other requirements). The Community Courts have acknowledged that cooperation with the Commission investigation may be rewarded.¹⁵⁶ The leniency policy must be understood within the framework of Commission's discretionary powers to set fines, in accordance with the limits set forth by Article 23 of Regulation 1/2003. The Community Courts have stated that the Commission's discretion to adjust the level of fines also applies to the leniency policy.¹⁵⁷ This policy is inter alia driven by the objectives of general prevention of infringements and of effective enforcement of the EC competition rules. Moreover, the Community Courts have recognised the Commission's discretion to set conditions for leniency and have stated that its leniency programmes may create legitimate expectations for companies.¹⁵⁸ However, the legitimate expectations that undertakings are able to derive from the Leniency Notice is limited to an assurance that their fines will be reduced by a certain percentage. The notice does not extend to the method of calculating fines or, a fortiori, to a specific level of the fine capable of being calculated at the time when the undertaking decides to implement his intention to cooperate with the Commission.¹⁵⁹ Therefore, a Commission notice constitutes a proper legal basis for the leniency policy.

3.5.5. Settlement procedure

132. On 30 June 2008, the Commission introduced a settlement procedure in cartel cases.¹⁶⁰ This new instrument allows the Commission to adopt a final decision in cartel cases through a simplified and quicker procedure, freeing up resources to handle more cases. The Commission retains a broad margin of discretion to determine which cases may be suitable for settlement. Parties have neither the duty nor the right to settle.
133. In the settlement procedure, parties may choose to acknowledge their involvement in a cartel and their liability for it, in exchange for a reduction of their fines by 10%. The Commission does not negotiate or bargain the use of evidence or the appropriate sanctions. However, the Commission effectively hears the parties and gives them an opportunity to argue their case. This form of cooperation is different from the voluntary production of information and evidence under the Leniency Notice (see above). It is not aimed at collecting evidence, but is a simplified procedure where parties acknowledge their involvement in a cartel and liability for it, having seen the evidence on which the Commission bases its envisaged objections. Where both a settlement reduction and a leniency reduction are applicable, they are applied cumulatively. In contrast to the commitment procedure under Article 9 of Regulation 1/2003, the administrative proceedings always end with a decision finding an infringement and imposing fines, irrespective of whether the standard procedure or the settlement procedure applies.

3.5.6. Recovery of fines from members of associations of undertakings

134. Article 23(4) of Regulation 1/2003 introduced a novel provision concerning the recovery of fines imposed on an association of undertakings taking account of the turnover of its members. It provides that in case the association is not solvent, it is obliged to call for contributions from its members to cover the amount of the fine. Where such contributions have not been made within a time-limit fixed by the Commission, the Commission may require payment of the fine directly by undertakings involved in the association according to the order set forth by that Article. By virtue of these provisions, members of an association are not fined themselves but may bear financial liability in order to ensure effective recovery of the fine when an infringement is committed by the association. However, such recovery shall not apply to undertakings which show that they have not implemented the infringing decision of the association and either were not aware of its existence or have actively distanced themselves from it before the Commission started investigating the case. The burden of proof of these two cumulative conditions rests on undertakings. The Commission has not applied Article 23(4) during the reporting period.

3.5.7. Fines for procedural infringements – seals case

135. Regulation 1/2003 introduced more effective sanctions for non-compliance with obligations incumbent on undertakings in the context of investigations (Article 23(1)).¹⁶¹ In January 2008, the Commission made use of this provision for the first time and imposed a fine of € 38 million on the German energy company, E.ON Energie AG for the breach of a seal.¹⁶² The Commission had found a seal broken on a door of E.ON's premises during an inspection in May 2006. The breach of the seal occurred, at the very least, as a result of negligence, since it was E.ON's responsibility to organise its own business sphere in such a way as to ensure that the instruction not to break the seal was complied with.¹⁶³ When setting the fine, the Commission considered that breaches of seals must, as a matter of principle, be regarded as a serious infringement. Accordingly, the level of the fine had to ensure that it had a sufficiently deterrent effect for E.ON, which is a large subsidiary of a major European energy company.¹⁶⁴

3.5.8. Periodic penalty payments to enforce prohibition decisions

136. Another important improvement introduced by Regulation 1/2003 concerns periodic penalty payments that can be imposed for failure to comply with a Commission decision. In order to better ensure compliance with enforcement decisions, Article 24(1) increased substantially the ceilings for these payments from those provided for in Regulation 17. The limit for periodic penalties is now 5 % of the average daily turnover in the preceding business year per day. One main objective of the revised framework was to ensure effective compliance with Commission decisions.
137. The Commission has had to use this provision notably in the case of Microsoft for failure to comply with its obligation to make interoperability information available to third parties on reasonable terms. In this case, the Commission had to adopt two decisions against Microsoft pursuant to Article 24(2) fixing the amount of the penalty payment for non-compliance with its obligations. These decisions were preceded by a separate decision¹⁶⁵ under Article 24(1) imposing daily periodic penalty payments. The first decision fixed an amount of €280.5 million¹⁶⁶ and the ¹⁶¹ The fines available under Regulation 17 had become highly ineffective.

¹⁶² A non-confidential version of the decision is available under http://ec.europa.eu/competition/antitrust/cases/index/by_nr_78.html#i39_326.

¹⁶³ In this respect, the Commission also noted that E.ON had not informed all personnel authorised to enter the E.ON building, e.g. its cleaner, about the existence of the seal and the need to respect it.

second decision imposed a €99 million penalty on Microsoft.¹⁶⁷ The case revealed that the multi-stage procedure foreseen in Article 24 can prove relatively lengthy and cumbersome, requiring successive statements of objections, oral hearings and decisions¹⁶⁸, and may thus not be optimally designed in view of the objective pursued by the Regulation. The potential room for improvement in this area should be examined.

138. In *MasterCard*¹⁶⁹, the Commission used Article 24 in a simpler procedure, announcing directly in the Article 7 decision a penalty payment of 3.5 % of MasterCard's daily turnover for each day of non-compliance after the period of six months given to comply with the decision. Accordingly, there was no need for a separate decision under Article 24(1), but the failure to comply with the Commission's decision before the fixed deadline would lead to the imposition of the definitive amount of the penalty payment in an Article 24(2) decision. In June 2008, MasterCard temporarily repealed its cross-border MIF for consumer cards, while it continued to engage in discussions with the Commission.¹⁷⁰ On 1 April 2009, the Commission took note of three undertakings given by MasterCard regarding the calculation of its cross-border MIF for consumer cards, the repeal of scheme fee increases announced in 2008 and the introduction of certain transparency enhancing measures.¹⁷¹

4. APPLICATION OF EC COMPETITION LAW IN ACCORDANCE WITH ARTICLE 3 OF REGULATION 1/2003

4.1. Introduction

139. Article 3 of Regulation 1/2003 regulated for the first time the relationship between national competition law and the EC competition rules. It represents a major step forward in ensuring a more level playing field for undertakings that are doing business in the internal market. Article 3 consists of two main elements: the

140. Article 3(1) obliges national competition authorities and courts to apply Articles 81 EC and 82 EC to agreements or conduct capable of affecting trade between Member States. The obligation to apply EC competition law is intended to ensure that the EC competition rules are applied to all cases within their scope. Compliance also entails that the cooperation mechanisms involving the Commission and national competition authorities and courts, as set forth in Articles 11 to 13 and 15, are fully applicable in such cases and are not avoided by applying only national law.
141. The convergence rule contained in paragraph 2, seeks to create a level playing field by providing for a single standard of assessment which allows undertakings to design EU-wide business strategies without having to check them against all the relevant national sets of competition rules. In its current wording, the obligation of convergence covers only the application of national competition law to agreements, concerted practices and decisions by associations of undertakings. Member States remain free to enact and maintain stricter national competition laws than Article 82 EC to prohibit or sanction unilateral conduct.
142. Overall, Article 3 can be characterised as one of the major successes of Regulation 1/2003. Stakeholders from the legal and business communities have largely confirmed that Regulation 1/2003 has positively contributed to the creation of a level playing field, along with the substantive convergence of national laws with the EC competition rules. On the other hand, the divergence of standards regarding unilateral conduct was commented on critically by the business and legal communities.

4.2. Obligation to apply Articles 81 and 82 EC

4.2.1. Effect on trade criterion and case record

143. While Articles 81(1) and 82 EC could be applied at Member State level under Regulation 17, there was no obligation to do so and many national competition authorities principally applied national competition law to the cases that they were dealing with. The obligation to apply the EC competition rules in Article 3(1) has led to a very significant increase in the application of Articles 81 and 82 EC, thereby making the cooperation mechanisms of the Regulation fully applicable.
144. The jurisdictional criterion that delineates the scope of application of Articles 81 and 82 EC, and thus the scope of the obligation to apply in Article 3, is the notion of effect on trade between Member States. This concept has been clarified in extensive case law of the Community Courts. In order to provide additional guidance, the Commission issued Guidelines concerning the concept of effect on trade which set out a methodology for the application of the effect on trade concept and includes guidance on frequently occurring situations.¹⁷²
145. The Guidelines remain relevant to this date as no significant change could be observed in the case law of the Community Courts. In particular, during the reporting period, the Court of First Instance confirmed, in a cartel case covering the territory of Austria, the established case law according to which horizontal cartels covering the whole of a Member State are normally capable of affecting trade between Member States even where the members of the cartel had not taken specific measures to exclude foreign competitors from the market.¹⁷³

146. The choice of the correct legal basis is the responsibility of the national competition authorities and courts in the individual case, in light of the facts at hand. The rule in Article 3(1) is directly applicable and imposes unconditional and precise obligations on the enforcers concerned. Compliance with Article 3(1) ensures that cases come under the mechanisms of Regulation 1/2003. Undertakings can rely on Article 3(1) in proceedings before both national competition authorities and courts, including at the judicial review stage, to invoke the application of EC competition law and of Regulation 1/2003.
147. Based on the available information, it appears that there is generally a high degree of awareness on the part of national competition authorities and courts of the obligation to apply Articles 81 and 82 EC. After 1 May 2004, national competition authorities massively migrated to the application of the EC competition rules where trade may be affected. By the end of 2004, they had already informed the Commission of 200 cases which they were handling on the basis of the EC competition rules.
148. Moreover, for a large number of national competition authorities, cases in which they applied the EC competition rules amounted to a significant share of their overall antitrust caseload. For instance, roughly one half of the enforcement decisions adopted by the Italian competition authority during the reporting period were based on Community law. The French competition authority applied EC competition law in nearly 40% and the Belgian, Danish and Dutch authorities in around 30% of all cases dealt with in the antitrust field. In Portugal and Greece this ratio was approximately 25 %, whereas Hungary and Slovenia were close to 20%.
149. Insofar as certain national competition authorities dealt with lower ratios of cases based on EC competition law, this can be due to a range of factors. Notably, the ratio will be crucially influenced by the priority setting applied by the respective national competition authorities. For instance, an authority that investigates numerous agreements or alleged abuses of local scope will have a lower percentage of cases based on EC competition law.¹⁷⁴ For the Member States that joined the EU in 2004 and 2007, and in particular Romania and Bulgaria, the rate of application of Articles 81 and 82 EC is also influenced by the period of applicability of those rules in their territories. Moreover, for some authorities, the overall number of formal enforcement decisions is too small to make meaningful conclusions about the ratio of EC law cases decided.
150. Feedback from stakeholders largely confirms that national competition authorities and courts in general appear to comply with their obligation to apply Articles 81 and/or 82 EC. Stakeholders raised few examples of alleged deviations. Moreover, in some Member States national courts have in certain cases construed the criterion of effect on trade more narrowly than the national competition authority. In Germany, for instance, the Higher Regional Court of Düsseldorf rejected the national competition authority's analysis in two decisions for the lack of sufficient evidence of foreclosure and any appreciable effect on trade.¹⁷⁵ In Italy, where national rules are not applied in parallel with Articles 81 and 82 EC, the Italian Supreme Administrative Court overturned a decision of the competition authority criticizing, inter alia, the lack of rigorous and concrete examination of the condition of effect on trade.¹⁷⁶ The French Court of Cassation, in turn, concluded in the Bausch and Lomb v Medint case¹⁷⁷ that the Court of Appeal's decision was not well founded as it had failed to establish whether the agreement concerning exclusive dealing between Chauvin and BL was liable to affect trade appreciably between Member States.

151. In sum, the obligation to apply the EC competition rules to cases capable of affecting trade has been broadly followed, making a single legal standard a reality on a very large scale. Given the central importance of the rule in Article 3(1) for ensuring a level playing field, the question merits the continued close attention of all enforcers. Parties are well placed to enforce the respect of the rule in Article 3(1) in any given individual case, including before the competent review courts which have the power and/or obligation to refer to the Court of Justice under Article 234 EC in appropriate cases. A persistent disregard for the rule in Article 3(1) and/or misconception about the effect on trade criterion in a Member State could also attract the attention of the Commission in view of its powers pursuant to Article 226 EC.¹⁷⁸

4.2.2. Experience with parallel application

152. Whilst Article 3(1) of Regulation 1/2003 requires the application of Articles 81 or 82 EC to cases capable of affecting trade between Member States, it does not impose an obligation to apply national law in parallel to such cases. The parallel application of national rules is thus optional and depends on the respective national system.¹⁷⁹ Certain Member States, such as Italy and Luxembourg, have indeed opted for the exclusive application of EC competition law to cases falling within its scope. Most Member States have, however, chosen the possibility to rely on a double legal base, and parallel application of the EC and national rules has become a well-established practice.
153. The primary interest of parallel application is that it protects enforcement decisions by national competition authorities against legal challenges based on the question whether there is effect on trade. In other words, if the EC law base is not upheld, the case would still stand for the infringement of national competition law.¹⁸⁰

154. The parallel application of Articles 81 and 82 EC and their national counterparts has not been reported to have caused major difficulties. In a small number of cases, national enforcers have dealt with infringements that were punishable under national competition law, for which however no legal basis for penalties existed in relation to Articles 81 and 82 EC at the relevant point in time. In these cases, sanctions could only be imposed on the basis of national competition law in accordance with the principle nullum crimen sine lege.
155. Certain national review courts have explicitly confirmed the principle of parallel application.¹⁸¹ In 2007, the Czech review court overruled the national competition authority's decisions in two cases¹⁸² on the ground that the application of EC and national competition law regarding the same infringement in the same decision would violate the principle of ne bis in idem. The Czech Supreme Administrative Court¹⁸³ later overturned the lower court's judgment and held that that court had misinterpreted the principle. The Commission considers that the finding of an infringement of both EC and national competition law and the sanctioning of such infringement in one single decision does not fall within the scope of ne bis in idem, as interpreted by the Community Courts¹⁸⁴ and the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR).¹⁸⁵ This case law sets out the difference between, on the one hand, a single decision finding that one conduct breached several legal provisions ('concurrence ideale') as opposed to the scenario of a second trial or punishment imposed for the same behaviour that could come under the principle of ne bis in idem.

4.3. The convergence rule

156. The parallel application of national competition law to agreements, concerted practices and decisions by associations of undertakings is subject to an obligation of convergence with Article 81 EC under Article 3(2) of Regulation 1/2003. Where such conduct is capable of affecting trade between Member States but does not restrict competition within the meaning of Article 81(1) EC or falls within the exception rule of Article 81(3) EC, it cannot be prohibited under national law. The rule in Article 3(2) is to be seen in the context of the principle of primacy of Community law. It flows from that principle that national competition law cannot ¹⁸⁵ In essence, the principle of ne bis in idem - developed in the context of criminal law - constitutes the right not to be tried or punished again for an offence for which he has already been finally acquitted or convicted; see Article 4 of Protocol No 7 ECHR and Article 50 European Charter of Fundamental Rights as well as e.g. ECtHR, Sergey Zolotukhin v. Russia, Judgment of 10 February 2009 ECtHR.

authorise an agreement or practice, which is prohibited by Articles 81 and/or 82 EC.¹⁸⁶

157. The objective of Article 3(2) is to create a level playing field within the internal market by prescribing a common competition law standard within the scope of application of the EC competition rules. Article 3(2) is a directly applicable rule that can be relied on before national courts, which implies that any measure adopted in breach of that rule would be inapplicable and unenforceable.
158. The convergence rule applies to agreements, concerted practices and decisions by associations of undertakings, whereas Member States are not precluded from enacting and applying stricter national laws which prohibit or sanction unilateral conduct.
159. No major difficulties with the application of the convergence rule have been reported. In view of some stakeholder submissions, it is worthwhile recalling that Article 3(2) does not apply to agreements or practices outside the jurisdictional scope of the EC competition rules. Accordingly, stricter national competition laws are not as such objectionable, as long as they are not applied to agreements, concerted practices and decisions of associations of undertakings that fall within the jurisdictional scope of the EC competition rules, in breach of Article 3(2).

4.4. Exception from the convergence rule for unilateral conduct

160. According to the last sentence of Article 3(2), Member States are not precluded from adopting and applying stricter national laws which prohibit or sanction unilateral conduct. Unilateral behaviour capable of affecting trade between Member States can thus be prohibited by national law, even if it occurs below the level of dominance or is not considered abusive within the meaning of Article 82. Article 3(2), last sentence, thus contains an exception from the level playing field and implies that undertakings doing cross-border business in the internal market may be subjected to a variety of standards as to their unilateral behaviour.
161. Provisions of the type referred to in Article 3(2) exist in a number of Member States. While such rules take different shapes, it is possible to identify certain categories which are described hereafter.

4.4.1. National rules concerning economic dependence and similar situations

162. As an example of stricter national rules concerning unilateral conduct, Recital 8 of Regulation 1/2003 explicitly mentions national provisions which prohibit or impose sanctions on abusive behaviour toward economically dependent undertakings. Besides rules concerning specifically the abuse of economic dependence, some national provisions regulate behaviour labelled as 'abuse of superior bargaining power' or 'abuse of significant influence'. The aim of these kinds of rules is essentially to regulate disparities of bargaining power in distribution relationships, including where neither the supplier nor the distributor holds a dominant position on a specific market.

See Recital 8 of Regulation 1/2003. See also Case 14/68 Walt Wilhelm [1969] ECR, p. 1.

163. In 2004, the Member States with specific provisions concerning the abuse of economic dependence or superior bargaining power included notably France, Germany, Italy, Portugal and Spain, as well as Ireland and Slovakia which had measures with a more limited scope covering groceries and retail trade, respectively. In Spain, these provisions were removed from competition law in 2007 but the abuse of economic dependence remains an infringement of the "Ley de Competencia Desleal", which concerns essentially unfair competition and trading practices, and the new competition law allows the competition authority to pursue such conduct where the distortion of free competition affects the public interest. Hungary, in turn, introduced provisions to prohibit abuses of significant market power in 2006 and Latvia did the same in 2008, both vesting the enforcement of these provisions to the competition authority. In Greece, the prohibition of the abuse of a relationship of economic dependence was reintroduced in 2005, after having been abolished in 2000.¹⁸⁷
164. The French, German, Greek and Portuguese laws concerning the abuse of "economic dependence" apply to various types of exclusionary conduct on both the demand and supply sides and normally require that there is no reasonable alternative source of supply or demand of the product or service in question.
165. For instance, in French law, the abuse of economic dependence is, along with the abuse of dominant position, one of the two forms of unilateral conduct prohibited by Article L.420-2 of the French Code de commerce. It prohibits, where the functioning or the structure of competition may be affected, the abusive exploitation of the condition of economic dependence in relation to a customer company or a supplier by non-dominant firms that have a powerful position with regard to their commercial partners. Such abuses may consist, inter alia, of the refusal to deal, tied sales or discriminatory practices. Due to the strict conditions of application¹⁸⁸, this provision has been rarely enforced, and since 2004 no sanction has been imposed on this legal basis. In 2007, in three out of four decisions applying Article L.420-2, the Competition Council concluded that there was either no dependence or insufficient evidence thereof.¹⁸⁹ In practice, the parties concerned seem to prefer relying on overlapping and more detailed provisions on pratiques commerciales déloyales.¹⁹⁰

166. In German law, Sections 20(2) and 20(4) of the German Competition Act set forth specific provisions protecting small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs) from "unfair hindrance" and discrimination, without objective justification, by undertakings with "superior market power". Section 20(2) relates to vertical dependence, whereas Section 20(4) is concerned with horizontal dependence and resale below cost (see below).¹⁹¹ SMEs can be qualified as dependent if they, as suppliers or purchasers of certain kinds of goods or services, depend on undertakings having superior market power to such an extent that sufficient and reasonable possibilities of resorting to other undertakings do not exist.¹⁹² The primary objective of these provisions is, hence, to ensure diversity of suppliers and to prevent the abuse of buyer power to gain additional discounts from suppliers. In practice, Section 20 has an important function for private enforcement, as private plaintiffs often invoke Section 20, instead of Article 82 EC and/or its counterpart in Section 19 of the German Competition Act.
167. The Latvian and Hungarian laws, in turn, which prohibit the abuse of "significant influence" or "significant market power", focus on the buyer power side by protecting local suppliers and distributors from being prejudiced by their relative lack of bargaining power as compared to the large retailers and supermarket chains. Under Hungarian law, buyer power is assessed on the basis of the retailer's turnover, regardless of its strength on the downstream market or on the size or countervailing seller power of large suppliers. In Latvia, further to a turnover threshold, a 25% market share threshold is applied to determine the condition of "significant influence". Certain other laws are yet more limited in scope, including for instance the Austrian statute for protecting local suppliers in rural areas,¹⁹³ and the Irish law concerning discriminatory and coercive conduct by grocery goods undertakings.¹⁹⁴
168. In most jurisdictions, including Germany, France, Greece, Ireland, Latvia and Portugal, the provisions in question are part of competition statutes and enforced by competition authorities but they may also emerge from a different legal context. In Italy, for instance, unlawful exploitation of a situation of inequality of market power can be addressed through a private civil action for injunctive relief and

¹⁹⁴ See the Irish Competition Act of 2002 and the Competition (Amendment) Act of 2006, Section 15.

compensation, which prevents firms from exploiting a situation of ‘economic dependence’ of their customers or suppliers in business-to-business relations.¹⁹⁵

169. Since 2004, some Member States have chosen to withdraw their regulation concerning economic dependence and similar forms of unequal bargaining power, others have introduced such regulation. There thus does not appear to be any general tendency in one direction or the other in the laws of the Member States.

4.4.2. Prohibition of resale below cost or at loss

170. Legal provisions concerning resale below cost or at loss are another type of regulation on unilateral market conduct.¹⁹⁶ These provisions normally outlaw resale prices that fall below the price the reseller paid for the product. They are often based on a similar economic rationale as provisions concerning predatory pricing but do typically not require proof of dominance.
171. Several Member States have, in recent years, removed their rules concerning resale below cost or at loss, including Ireland, Italy, and the United Kingdom. The Member States currently prohibiting resale below cost or at loss include notably France, Germany, Spain and Portugal. In the latter two, resale at loss is regulated outside competition law, in particular in statutes concerning unfair competition and trading practices.¹⁹⁷
172. In France, Article L.420-5¹⁹⁸ of the Code de Commerce contains a prohibition on offers or "abusively low" pricing practices where the object or effect of such offers or practices is to exclude an undertaking from the market. The conditions of application of this provision are otherwise similar to those concerning predatory pricing (cost test), but its scope is limited to sales to consumers, not to commercial customers, and it does not require proof of a dominant position. The Competition Council has never imposed sanctions for the infringement of this provision and it has been very rarely invoked in practice. The last decisions concerning the application of L.420-5 were taken in 2004, both rejecting the allegations regarding abusively low prices.¹⁹⁹ Whilst

The "Loi Galland" of 1996 prohibited selling at a loss, defined as a price less than the invoice price plus transportation costs and taxes, expanding the prohibition in order to control the use of "marges arrières", i.e. devices which had the effect of changing the prices effectively paid from those shown on the invoice at time of delivery.

retail trade has traditionally been highly regulated in France²⁰⁰, this Member State has recently taken some steps to reduce regulation concerning distribution and retail trade.²⁰¹ One of these measures was the lowering of the threshold for resale at loss, which allows deeper discounting by resellers so that they can sell at lower prices than previously without breaching Article L.420-5.²⁰²

173. In Germany, resale below cost price is one of the forms of "unfair hindrance" by undertakings with "superior market power" prohibited by Section 20(4) of the German Competition Act.²⁰³ The provision generally requires that sales below cost price take place in a certain market 'not merely occasionally'. The ban was tightened in 2007 in relation to the groceries retail market, by extending it also to occasional offers of foodstuffs below cost price unless there is an objective justification.²⁰⁴

4.4.3. Stricter national rules concerning dominance and dominant undertakings

174. Besides the rules applicable to unilateral behaviour by firms that expressly extend to undertakings that do not have a dominant position in the market within the meaning of Article 82 EC, national laws may also foresee different standards for assessing dominance as well as stricter national provisions governing the conduct of dominant undertakings.
175. Stakeholders pointed to a degree of diversity in the national law counterparts of Article 82 EC or their application. This relates inter alia to the fact that certain

national laws foresee different standards for finding dominance, even where those rules are otherwise modelled on Article 82 EC. An example is found in Austrian law²⁰⁵, according to which an undertaking is deemed to be dominant if it has a superior position in relation to its customers or suppliers, in particular where the latter are dependent on the maintenance of the business relationship if they want to avoid severe business disadvantages. Dominance is presumed, shifting thus the burden of proof, when an undertaking holds: (i) at least 30% share in the relevant market; or (ii) in excess of 5% and is exposed to competition of no more than two undertakings; or (iii) a share in excess of 5% and belongs to the four largest entrepreneurs in this market, which hold a combined share of at least 80% of sales on the relevant market. In those cases the burden of proof shifts to the alleged dominant undertaking to show that it is not dominant.²⁰⁶ Similar laws exist in other Member States.

176. Furthermore, the exception entails that Member States laws may impose stricter rules on dominant undertakings. For example, during the reporting period, Section 29 of the German Competition Act was amended to include a specific provision against the abuse of market power in the energy sector, enacted due to concerns over the energy price levels and the lack of competition in the energy networks' upstream and downstream markets.²⁰⁷ The purpose of this sector-specific provision is to prevent excessive pricing in the energy sector.²⁰⁸ It allows finding an abuse where a dominant supply undertaking demands, without objective justification, payment which is higher than those demanded by other supply undertakings.²⁰⁹

4.4.4. Evaluation and feedback

177. The business and legal communities have called for an extension of the convergence rule to national laws covering unilateral conduct. Feedback from stakeholders suggests that diverging standards fragment business strategies that are typically formulated on a pan-European or global basis. This is not a priori contradicted by the fact that some of the national provisions on unilateral conduct appear to be rarely applied in the practice of national competition authorities. This does not mean that the existence of these provisions would be without effect from the perspective of market participants, since firms have to make sure that their practices comply with all the legal standards in those Member States in which they have activities.
178. Concepts such as the abuse of economic dependency exist in the competition laws of some Member States, as seen above. Yet, it is not clear whether competition law is ²⁰⁶ Legal assumption laid down in Section 4 subsection 2 of the Austrian Cartel Act 2005.

²⁰⁸ See Government Reasoning to the Act to Combat Price Abuse in the Energy Sector and the Grocery Retail Market, Official Records of the German Bundestag 16/5847 of 27 June 2007, pp. 9 et seq.

the appropriate instrument to address concerns arising from e.g. disparities in bargaining power (see paragraph 181 below).²¹⁰ As regards specifically the laws concerning resale below cost or at loss, certain studies have suggested that this kind of regulation results in price increases and loss of consumer welfare.²¹¹

179. Against this background, the exclusion of unilateral conduct from the scope of the convergence rule is a matter which should be further examined, both in terms of evaluating the extent of any potential problems and assessing the need for action at European level.

4.5. Questions relating to the scope of Article 3

180. Article 3(3) specifies that paragraphs 1 and 2 do not preclude the application of national provisions that predominantly pursue an objective different from that pursued by Articles 81 and 82 EC. Article 3 thus applies to national laws that aim at protecting or promoting competition, not to state measures pursuing predominantly other legitimate objectives, such as those prohibiting or sanctioning unfair trading practices, the application of which does not depend on the "actual or presumed effects of such acts on competition on the market"²¹². As an example of this kind of legislation falling within Article 3(3), Recital 9 of Regulation 1/2003 mentions those prohibiting undertakings from imposing on their trading partners terms and conditions that are unjustified, disproportionate or without consideration.
181. Drawing the borderline appears particularly difficult in relation to laws concerning stricter competition rules for unilateral conduct, on the one hand, and laws covering unfair trading practices, on the other hand, both of which currently fall outside the scope of the convergence rule. If the objective of the national rules is to regulate contractual relationships between undertakings by stipulating the terms and conditions that for instance suppliers must offer to distributors (rather than their competitive behaviour on the market), the proper classification appears to be that of laws concerning unfair trading practices. On the other hand, national rules combating excessive market power or protecting smaller undertakings in a market against their larger competitors appear more likely to be considered competition law provisions.²¹³

²¹⁰ See ICN Special Program for Kyoto Annual Conference, Report on Abuse of Superior Bargaining Position, prepared by Task Force for Abuse of Superior Bargaining Position, ICN 7th Annual Conference, Kyoto, Japan, April 14-16, 2008.

²¹¹ For instance, in the UK the Office of Fair Trading concluded that the removal of the prohibition of resale below cost has generally proven beneficial to consumers with lower prices, more choices and no decline in quality. See U.K. Office of Fair Trading, "Supermarkets: The Code of Practice and Other Competition Issues, Conclusions" (August 2005). In France, certain studies also suggest that resale prices increased as a result of the Loi Galland of 1996, with the largest increases being for well-known brands. See also OECD Roundtable on Resale Below Cost Laws and Regulations, Note by the Secretariat, Directorate for Financial and Enterprise Affairs, Competition Committee, 22 September 2005 (concluding that predatory foreclosure could be more accurately analysed and addressed in the context of rules concerning the abuse of dominant position through predatory pricing, rather than by laws regulating resale below cost).

²¹² See Recital 9 of Regulation 1/2003.

²¹³ It has been submitted that the main distinctive feature is whether the aim of the provision is limited to regulating a contractual relationship with a view to protecting a weaker party against a stronger party or whether competition on the market is taken into account either in the elaboration of the rule or its application. Each individual provision of national law should be examined, rather than the overall

5. EFFECTIVE AND COHERENT ENFORCEMENT BY MORE ENFORCERS – THE CONTRIBUTION OF THE MEMBER STATES' COMPETITION AUTHORITIES AND THE EUROPEAN COMPETITION NETWORK (ECN)

182. Regulation 1/2003 has entrusted the Member States' competition authorities with a key role in ensuring that the EU competition rules are applied effectively and consistently, in conjunction with the Commission. This has presented both an opportunity and a challenge. After five years, it is apparent that the key challenge in this respect, to boost enforcement results while ensuring the consistent and coherent application of EC competition rules, has been largely achieved.
183. During the reporting period, the Commission and the Member States' competition authorities have worked together towards the aim of making Europe an open business environment with a level playing field. Cooperation in the ECN has surpassed expectations and has given a more 'structural impetus' to the enforcement of the EC competition rules.²¹⁴ The possibility to (re-) allocate cases to a another well placed authority and the co-operation mechanisms provided by Regulation 1/2003 have been used reasonably and largely successfully and have significantly enhanced the enforcement activities within the ECN. Informal exchanges and cooperation in various multilateral fora have contributed towards building a common competition culture.

5.1. National competition authorities as enforcers of the EU competition rules

5.1.1. Enforcement record of the authorities in the ECN

184. Since the entry into force of Regulation 1/2003, the enforcement of EC competition rules has vastly increased. The results of enforcement actions within the ECN are impressive.²¹⁵ More than 1000²¹⁶ cases have been pursued over the last five years on the basis of the Community competition rules. Within this time period the Commission has been informed of more than 300 envisaged decisions submitted by the national competition authorities pursuant to Article 11(4) of Regulation 1/2003. These figures compared to the situation before the entry into force of Regulation 1/2003²¹⁷ clearly demonstrate a significant increase of enforcement activities in the EU since 2004.
185. Not only the Commission²¹⁸, but also the Member States' competition authorities launched major sector inquiries in important sectors such as energy²¹⁹, financial statute in which it is contained. See e.g. De Smijter E. and Kjoelbye, L. The Enforcement system under Regulation 1/2003, in Faull & Nikpay: The EC law of competition, part 2.59.

services²²⁰, media²²¹, pharmaceuticals²²² and food²²³. Other areas as for example motor vehicles²²⁴, taxis²²⁵, air transport²²⁶, construction²²⁷, healthcare²²⁸, environment²²⁹ and telecoms²³⁰ were also investigated. Sector inquiries have become a frequently used and highly valuable enforcement tool within the ECN. They have led to investigations in individual cases and have served to identify (wider) competition problems on particular markets and provided information on how these could be best addressed.

186. Enforcement by national competition authorities demonstrates a strong emphasis on the liberalised sectors (e.g. energy, telecoms, post), where the high number of envisaged decisions confirms the importance of antitrust vigilance in this field. In the energy sector for instance, the Commission has been informed of more than 30 envisaged decisions since January 2007. Other key sectors were financial services, transport, food, pharmaceuticals and construction. Member States' competition authorities also pro-actively deal with cases that did not previously attract antitrust attention, for example in the field of professional services.²³¹
187. Approximately 55% of the envisaged decisions about which the Commission has been informed pursuant to Article 11(4) concerned an infringement of Article 81 EC, approximately 30% an infringement of Article 82 EC and the remainder an infringement of both provisions. Most of these decisions are prohibition decisions imposing fines.²³²
188. Cartels, the most pernicious infringements of the EC competition rules, were pursued in some 90 cases by the ECN members since May 2004. The Commission has adopted 33 cartel decisions over this period, with the national competition authorities taking more than 50 such decisions.²³³ Close cooperation in a number of cartel cases, such as the Flat Glass case²³⁴ where several competition authorities provided information that was crucial to start the Commission's investigation, or the Elevators case²³⁵ where the Commission's investigation triggered investigations at national level²³⁶, has significantly contributed to this record.

189. A large number of Member States introduced the power to adopt commitment decisions in line with Article 9 of Regulation 1/2003.²³⁷ As a consequence, a significant increase in such decisions could be observed, in particular as from 2007 onwards.²³⁸

5.1.2. Evolving Structure of National Competition Authorities

190. Regulation 1/2003 does not compel Member States to adopt a specific institutional framework for the implementation of EC competition rules. The prerequisite established by Article 35 of Regulation 1/2003 is that "Member States shall designate the competition authority or authorities responsible for the application of Articles 81 and 82 EC in such a way that the provisions of this regulation are effectively complied with". It is the responsibility of the Member States to decide on the structure and organisation of their respective competition authorities. Member States may allocate different powers and functions to the different authorities and they may also decide on the administrative or judicial nature of the authority, subject to the general Community law principles of equivalence and effectiveness.
191. Paragraph 2 of the Commission Notice on cooperation within the Network of Competition Authorities (the "Network Notice")²³⁹ identifies basic types of authorities present in the network. During the first five years of application of the Regulation, a significant degree of evolution in Member States' enforcement structures could be observed, with Member States generally striving to have effective enforcement structures in place.
192. By the end of the reporting period, most Member States have a system of one administrative authority investigating and deciding cases.²⁴⁰ Several Member States' systems migrated from dual administrative authority systems towards a single authority. In Spain, for example, the two former competition bodies were replaced by a single independent authority – the National Competition Commission (NCC) by the Competition Act 15/2007.²⁴¹ Most recently Estonia²⁴² has changed its initially dual system into one single authority. The French system has also been subject to significant changes in 2008/2009²⁴³, in particular providing the new Autorité de la Concurrence with extended powers in antitrust and mergers.²⁴⁴

193. Belgium²⁴⁵ and Luxembourg²⁴⁶ currently still opt for a traditional dual administrative system. In Ireland and Austria the investigations are carried out by the respective competition authorities²⁴⁷, with the decision-making powers having been transferred to courts.²⁴⁸ In Malta, the Office of Fair Competition is part of the Ministry of Finance. In Greece²⁴⁹, Ireland²⁵⁰ and the United Kingdom²⁵¹, sectoral regulators are empowered to enforce the EC competition rules in specific sectors, e.g. telecommunications, postal services, energy. In all Member States the decisions of the national competition authorities are subject to judicial review.
194. In general, the differences in the institutional structure of the national competition authorities have not raised any particular issues in the application of Articles 81 and 82 EC.²⁵² Certain criticism has been expressed in the course of the public consultation for this Report as to the limited resources of some national competition authorities and its possible impact on competition proceedings, e.g. limited capacities for investigations, longer duration of proceedings.

²⁴⁸ In Austria, the Cartel Court, "Oberlandesgericht Wien als Kartellgericht", has exclusive jurisdiction to decide whether a certain agreement or behaviour violates competition law. In Ireland, decisions in competition matters are made by courts, either in the course of a criminal prosecution, or in civil proceedings brought by the Competition Authority or by the Commission for Communications Regulation.

5.1.3. Powers of the National Competition Authorities to apply Articles 81 and 82 EC

195. As mentioned, Article 35, in conjunction with Article 5, requires that Member States designate a competition authority to enforce Articles 81 and 82 EC. A clear empowerment is the prerequisite for effective enforcement. During the reporting period, three situations attracted the attention of the Commission in this regard. In 2006, the Commission for the Protection of Competition of Cyprus decided²⁵³ that it lacked the power to apply Articles 81 and 82 EC, because national law made no provision to this effect, and it had not been designated as competition authority pursuant to Article 35 of Regulation 1/2003. The issue was later addressed by legislative amendments and government measures. In 2007, the Commission initiated infringement proceedings against the Czech Republic following an amendment to the Competition Act in 2005. The amendment excluded the application of the Competition Act in relation to behaviour in breach of the regulatory framework for electronic communications. The Commission closed the case after these provisions had been repealed.²⁵⁴ Recently, infringement proceedings were initiated against the Slovak Republic in a similar case²⁵⁵. It appears that Section 2(6) of the Slovak Competition Act limits the ability of the Slovak Competition Authority to effectively apply Articles 81 and 82 EC to anticompetitive behaviour which falls under the competence of a regulatory authority, such as the Slovak Telecommunications Office. The Commission is therefore seeking clarification from the Slovak authorities on whether the Slovak Republic is respecting its obligations under Article 10 EC in combination with Articles 35 and 5 of Regulation 1/2003.

5.1.4. Powers of the National Competition Authorities pursuant to Article 5

196. Article 5 of Regulation 1/2003 sets out the national competition authorities' powers to apply Article 81 and 82 EC in individual cases. In essence, Article 5 lists the types of decisions which national competition authorities can take, i.e. those finding an infringement, ordering interim measures, accepting commitments and imposing fines and other penalties. It concludes that "(w)here on the basis of the information in their possession the conditions for prohibition are not met they may likewise decide that there are no grounds for action on their part."
197. During the reporting period, the interpretation of Article 5 has given rise to certain queries. Firstly, the question has arisen whether Article 5 is capable of direct effect, i.e. if the powers listed in that provision are immediately and directly available to all national competition authorities even if not expressly provided for by national law. Absent any guidance from case law, this question is still subject to discussion. Its practical relevance has declined insofar as national competition authorities gradually obtained additional powers pursuant to national laws.²⁵⁶
198. Moreover, the question has come up whether national competition authorities may adopt declaratory decisions in relation to past infringements. Given that Article 5 does not contain a provision equivalent to the last paragraph of Article 7(1) of ²⁵³ Case Lumiere TV Public Company Ltd./Multichoice (national file reference 11.17.14/2006), See <http://www.competition.gov.cy>.

Regulation 1/2003, there remains a question mark about whether the lack of an express provision may prevent national competition authorities from taking a decision on the basis of Articles 81 and 82 EC in relation to past infringements where they do not intend to impose a fine.

199. In conclusion, the first practical experiences with Article 5 of Regulation 1/2003 have shown that some uncertainties remain in this context.

5.1.5. Convergence and Divergence of national competition authorities' powers

200. Crucially, Article 5 is a very rudimentary rule. Regulation 1/2003 does not formally regulate or harmonise the procedures of national competition authorities over and above Article 5 and the rules applicable to cooperation mechanisms. This implies that European competition authorities apply the same substantive rules according to divergent procedures and they may impose a variety of sanctions.²⁵⁷ In important respects, the Regulation reconciled the requirements of substantive coherence with the existing procedural diversity amongst European Competition authorities.²⁵⁸
201. Nevertheless, the entry into force of Regulation 1/2003 has generated an unprecedented degree of voluntary convergence of the procedural rules dedicated to the implementation of Articles 81 and 82 EC.²⁵⁹
202. An area where considerable convergence has taken place is leniency where 25 Member States now operate a leniency programme and have largely aligned their programmes to the ECN Model Programme adopted in September 2006.²⁶⁰ An alignment of investigative powers of the national competition authorities has taken place over the last years concerning inspections in business premises (e.g. powers related to on the spot investigations – power to seal premises, books and records, to ask for oral explanations). The majority of the national competition authorities themselves see no significant differences with regard to the Commission powers under Articles 19 and 20 of Regulation 1/2003.²⁶¹ Many Member States have also introduced the power to inspect private premises, although several national competition authorities have however indicated that they do not yet have any practical experience in this regard.²⁶² Finally, considerable convergence has also taken place with regard to fines²⁶³, the power to adopt interim measures, commitment decisions and the power to carry out sector inquiries.²⁶⁴

²⁵⁷ Pecuniary and/or custodial sanctions on individuals and undertakings.

²⁶⁰ See below, part 5.3.

²⁶¹ E.g. Belgium, Cyprus, CZ Republic, Denmark, Estonia, Greece, Finland, Italy, Latvia, Lithuania, Luxembourg, Netherlands, Poland, Romania, Slovenia, Slovak Republic, Spain, UK (civil cases). In several Member States, judicial authorisation for inspections of business premises is required: Austria, Bulgaria, Germany (fines procedure), France, Hungary, Ireland, Portugal, Sweden.

²⁶² Cyprus, CZ Republic, Estonia, Greece, Spain, Hungary, Luxembourg, Malta, Romania, Slovenia, Slovak Republic, Sweden. The power to inspect private premises is not foreseen in Bulgaria, Denmark, Finland, Italy, Portugal.

²⁶³ All Member States provide for pecuniary sanctions on undertakings. It should however be noted that there still exist considerable differences as regards the level of fines and the calculation of fines. Recent efforts within ECA (European Competition Authorities, founded in 2001, a forum of discussion for

203. However, this remarkable level of convergence should not lead to an underestimation of the still existing divergences on important procedural issues that may influence the outcome of individual cases, e.g. fines, criminal sanctions, liability of undertakings or associations of undertakings, succession of undertakings, prescription periods, standard of proof and the power to impose structural remedies. Moreover, the ability of national competition authorities to set priorities is greatly divergent insofar as a large number of authorities are obliged to investigate and/or rule on complaints that they are seized with²⁶⁵, while others are legally empowered to set priorities in one form or another.
204. With regard to fines, for example, there is a consistent trend towards ensuring that antitrust fines have a sufficient deterrent effect. The vast majority of competition agencies take into account the same or similar elements when setting the appropriate level of antitrust fines. However, the legislative and administrative frameworks are not identical. These differences can result in appreciable divergences in the calculation of fines. Moreover, competition law and the guidelines adopted by several authorities do not quantify in detail the relative weight of the fundamental criteria and/or the adjustment factors which concur to the quantification of the antitrust fines. This has led to significant divergences in the practical application of even largely corresponding provisions.
205. In other areas too, where a high level of convergence is observed in the sense that numerous Member States broadly aligned their laws on the model of the Regulation, a considerable degree of (micro-) divergence remains in relation to the exact features of the procedures applied. This is for instance the case for procedures leading to commitment decisions as well as the procedures available for follow-up of commitment decisions. In this context, it appeared that many authorities do not follow the scheme of Regulation 1/2003 in terms of preparing a preliminary assessment and market testing. Conversely, certain national systems foresee procedural constraints unknown to the Commission, e.g. a cut-off date for the submission of commitments. At least one authority does not have the power to impose fines directly in case of non-compliance with a commitment decision.
206. Stakeholders in the context of the public consultation for this Report have called strongly for further harmonisation of procedures within the ECN. They particularly emphasised different national rules on sanctions/fines for violations of Articles 81 and 82 EC, leniency, settlements, commitments, complaints, rules governing the admissibility of evidence (e.g. Legal Professional Privilege – LPP) and procedural rules (e.g. limitations, deadlines, procedural fines etc.). According to stakeholders, these differences in national rules may lead to discrepancies in the outcome of a case depending on the jurisdiction in which it is reviewed and could therefore harm the rights of undertakings.

Competition Authorities in the EEA) have led to the adoption of the "Principles for convergence on pecuniary sanctions imposed on undertakings for infringements of antitrust law", in May 2008; see <http://ec.europa.eu/comm/competition/publications/eca/>.

Belgium, Bulgaria, Cyprus, Czech Republic, Greece, Spain, Finland (rather flexible system), France, Hungary, Ireland, Italy, Lithuania, Luxembourg, Latvia, Malta, Netherlands, Romania, UK.

207. The subject of divergences in national procedures for the enforcement of Articles 81 and 82 EC should be further reflected upon. In order to optimise the efficiency of procedures within the ECN, areas need to be identified where further convergence should be promoted. Such a policy discussion should also explore the means by which procedural convergence could best be achieved, e.g. soft harmonisation or the adoption of certain minimum standards through legislative rules.

5.2. Cooperation between enforcers

5.2.1. Work sharing in the network – principles

208. The work-sharing arrangement within the ECN, i.e. the system of parallel competences²⁶⁶ and flexible case-allocation rules, means that any "well-placed" authority can take action in a case. Indicative, non-binding principles are set out in the Network Notice, which explain when a Network member is well-placed to act.²⁶⁷ The case allocation principles do not create individual rights for the companies involved in, or affected by, an infringement to have a case dealt with by a particular authority.²⁶⁸
209. A competition authority which is well placed and willing to investigate and sanction an infringement informs the Network of its intentions at an early stage of the investigation²⁶⁹ by inserting some basic information in the ECN database. This allows the network members to detect rapidly multiple proceedings and ensures efficient work-sharing within the ECN. Other authorities may signal their interest to also act in the case, either in parallel with the first authority (in the case of national competition authorities) or solely (in the case of the Commission). In the rare case that authorities disagree on the most suitable allocation of the case, bilateral discussions take place between the concerned authorities.
210. The Commission is in principle always well placed to deal with any infringement of the Treaty capable of having an effect on trade between Member States. It is particularly well-placed to act where the infringement has effects in more than three Member States or where there is a link to other priority actions of the Community.²⁷⁰ On the other hand, the Commission is never obliged to act, even if a given case has effects in more than three Member States. Cases may also be re-allocated within the network members if efficient enforcement so requires.²⁷¹

²⁶⁸ The Network Notice, para 31. This question was raised in Cases T-339/04 and T-340/04, France Télécom [2007] ECR II-521.

²⁶⁹ Pursuant to Article 11(3) of Regulation 1/2003, national competition authorities inform the Commission when they are acting under Articles 81 and 82 EC, before or without delay after commencing the first formal investigative measure. It has been agreed amongst the members of the ECN that the national competition authorities will also get this information (see the Network Notice, Point 17). Similarly, the Commission will inform the other ECN members when it starts investigating a case (Article 11(2) of Regulation 1/2003).

²⁷⁰ The Network Notice, paras 14-15.

²⁷¹ The Network Notice, paras 6 and 7.

211. The principles of work sharing as introduced by Regulation 1/2003 and the Network Notice have been fully endorsed by the Court of First Instance in the France Télécom judgments of 8 March 2007.²⁷² The cases concerned an action for the annulment of a decision by the Commission to conduct an inspection targeted at France Télécom and its subsidiaries (Wanadoo was at the time a subsidiary of France Télécom) and aimed at finding evidence of a suspected violation of Article 82 EC by predatory pricing and margin squeeze in the market for high-speed Internet access for residential customers in France.²⁷³ Prior to the Commission's inspection decision, a competitor of Wanadoo had filed a complaint and an application for interim measures with the French Conseil de la Concurrence. The application for interim measures was rejected by the latter for lack of urgency one week before the adoption of the Commission's inspection decision. The inspection decision was appealed by both Wanadoo and France Télécom.²⁷⁴ The applications for annulment invoked a broad range of pleas, concerning notably the reasoning of the Commission's inspection decision and the extent of its obligation to cooperate with national courts called upon to authorise coercive measures in case of opposition.
212. In its judgment in Case T-339/04, the Court of First Instance rejected the arguments of the applicant(s) in their entirety. It held in particular that Regulation 1/2003 has, in conformity with the principle of subsidiarity, provided for a wider association of the national competition authorities with the application of the EC competition rules. The Regulation has, however, not changed the general competence of the Commission recognised by the case law of the Court of Justice (Masterfoods).²⁷⁵
213. Moreover, the Court of First Instance held that Regulation 1/2003 has not established a 'division of competences' that could preclude the Commission from carrying out an inspection where a national competition authority is already dealing with the same case. On the contrary, Article 11(6) provides that the Commission is empowered – upon simple consultation of the national authority – to initiate proceedings with a view to adopt a decision itself. A fortiori, it is able to conduct an inspection in such case. Neither the Network Notice – as evidenced by its contents and wording – nor the Joint Statement establish binding criteria that could lead to the conclusion that solely the Conseil de la Concurrence could deal with the case and that the Commission was prevented from doing so. Furthermore, the Court of First Instance held that the obligation of close cooperation in Article 11(1) does not support the conclusion that the Commission could not investigate a case when a national competition authority is already dealing with it. The opposite can be derived from Article 11(6). The principle of subsidiarity does not put into question the competences conferred on the Commission by the EC Treaty, which include the enforcement of the EC competition rules. In Case T-340/04, the Court of First Instance further stated that Article 11(6) leaves scope for parallel investigations by the Commission and national competition authorities in the early stages of a case.

²⁷² Case T-339/04 and Case T-340/04, France Télécom v. Commission, [2007] ECR II-521.

²⁷⁴ During the judicial proceedings, Wanadoo and its parent merged. France Telecom thus became the applicant in both court cases.

²⁷⁵ Case C-344/98, Masterfoods, [2000] ECR I-11369.

5.2.2. Work sharing – practical experience

214. Five years of experience of work-sharing within the ECN have clearly demonstrated and confirmed the well-functioning of the flexible and pragmatic approach introduced by Regulation 1/2003 and the Network Notice. Contrary to the various concerns raised at the time of the adoption of the modernisation package, discussions on case-allocation came up only in a few cases and actual re-allocation of cases took place even less, i.e. cases mostly remain with the competition authority that started the investigation. Also the public consultation has shown that the legal and business community has dropped its initial fears and has only rarely called for more clarity in this respect. Claims for binding case-allocation criteria remain isolated.
215. Case-allocation and re-allocation have played a role mainly in cartel cases or in investigations started by a complaint.
216. In several cartel cases, notably in which parallel leniency applications had been received, the Commission and national competition authorities cooperated at an early stage. In the Flat Glass cartel case²⁷⁶, for example, the Commission started its investigation in 2005 on the basis of information provided by several national competition authorities²⁷⁷ which had received complaints or leads from customers or other third parties that suspected the a cartel existed. In the *Power Transformers case*²⁷⁸ the German Bundeskartellamt dealt with a separate, but related case.
217. Furthermore, a certain number of complaints received by the Commission or a Member State competition authority or both have been passed on within the Network. Important examples are the Deutsche Post cases where the Commission and the German competition authority were seized with similar complaints referring to Article 82 EC concerning the same practice of Deutsche Post AG with regard to discounts for pre-sorted mail. Deutsche Post's practice was based on a provision of the German postal legislation which was the subject of a Commission procedure under Article 86 EC. In this case, the Commission whose experts were preparing the Article 86 decision, considered that the most effective and efficient way forward would be the investigation of the complaint by the Bundeskartellamt. The complainant agreed to withdraw the complaint with the Commission. The work sharing proved successful inasmuch as both proceedings have now been concluded by decisions.²⁷⁹ Both decisions have been appealed. These cases are a remarkable example of how the action of the Commission and that of a Member State competition authority can effectively complement each other in practice.
218. The issue of work sharing was also addressed in the Wanadoo case the details of which are already described above.²⁸⁰ In the so called iTunes case concerning on-line delivery of music, the Commission was approached by the UK Office of Fair

Trading, which had been seized with a complaint from a consumer organisation. The Commission agreed to take up the case which concerned several Member States and opened proceedings in April 2007.²⁸¹ After Apple's announcement to equalise prices for music downloads from iTunes in Europe in January 2008²⁸², the case was closed.

219. More recent examples of re-allocation of cases which took place from the Commission to national competition authorities concern an investigation related to a triple play offer (TV, telephone and broadband) jointly commercialised by Telefonica and Sogecable²⁸³ and investigations into the joint selling of football rights²⁸⁴.
220. Re-allocation of cases between national competition authorities has been very rare. The Commission has been informed only of three cases. These re-allocations were mainly due to the fact that the locations of the companies concerned by the investigations were situated in another Member State.²⁸⁵
221. The cases mentioned generally illustrate how work-sharing in the Network takes place in practice. As is well known, Regulation 1/2003 does not provide for a "transfer" of cases as such. "Re-allocation" involves one authority going ahead with the investigation of a case while another authority abstains from acting or closes its file either on the basis of its discretion (not) to act or on the basis of Article 13 of the Regulation.
222. One issue which has given rise to certain discussions in the Network relates to the situation where a national competition authority is seized by a complainant but is not particularly well placed to deal with the case, as it requires extensive investigations in other Member States. However, the Commission or another national competition authority does not consider the case to be a priority. Such a "negative conflict of allocation" scenario has occurred in very limited instances. It is in the first place linked to the afore-mentioned issue that some authorities in the network are bound to deal with cases, even where they are not an enforcement priority, whereas others are not. Still, the subject may merit further observation in the practice of the network, with a view to determine if the mechanisms for assistance should be enhanced in order to further improve the ability of national competition authorities to deal with cases requiring fact-finding in other Member States.
223. Parallel proceedings between network members are also very rare. The vast majority of national competition authorities have not acted in parallel to other national competition authorities or to the Commission. One single case of parallel action in relation to a single infringement can be reported upon: the German and the Belgian competition authorities received a leniency application relating to a European wide price-fixing cartel for the chemical product Benzyl-Buthyl-Phtalat. Both authorities investigated the case and imposed fines.²⁸⁶ The Belgian authority which imposed the ²⁸⁴ For instance re-allocation to German competition authority and the Danish competition authority.

²⁸⁵ Two re-allocation of cases took place towards the UK OFT, both cases were closed.

²⁸⁶ Decision of the German Bundeskartellamt in case B 11-23/05. Decision of Belgian Competition Council of 4 April 2008, second fine notably contemplated the issue of "ne bis in idem". It considered inter alia that it was able to impose a fine in regard of the effects of the cartel in the Belgian territory and based on the turnover in Belgium insofar as the first fine had been imposed by the German authority in view of the effects in the German territory only. The case might prima facie have presented the opportunity for the Community Courts (pursuant to an Article 234 EC reference) to clarify questions relating to the principle of ne bis in idem and in particular the definition of 'idem'. However, neither of the decisions was appealed.

224. In conclusion, work sharing within the ECN has worked very well. The ECN is well equipped to avoid unnecessary duplication of work and to ensure efficient enforcement. The ECN members have demonstrated their readiness to solve case-allocation issues in a manner that ensures efficient work-sharing.

5.3. ECN cooperation in the field of leniency

5.3.1. The ECN Model Leniency Programme

225. Since 2004, significant developments have taken place in the field of leniency programmes within the ECN. Regulation 1/2003 is built on a system of parallel competences in which national competition authorities are active enforcers of Articles 81 and 82 EC alongside the Commission. A logical consequence of such a system is that a leniency applicant may need to protect its position with all the authorities that may impose sanctions for the cartel activity, i.e. it entails a need for multiple filings in different jurisdictions.
226. The co-existence of several leniency programs within the European Union has been addressed as from the entry into force of Regulation 1/2003. In the Commission Notice on Cooperation within the Network of Competition Authorities (the "Network Notice"), potential applicants were advised that they might have an interest in protecting their position in several jurisdictions.²⁸⁷ Moreover, safeguards concerning the transmission of leniency related information within the ECN were put in place.²⁸⁸
227. As from 2005, a dedicated ECN Leniency Working Group prepared further measures, considering that certain discrepancies indeed may have adverse effects on the effectiveness of the programmes and on the incentives of undertakings to disclose their cartel activities throughout the EU. To address these concerns, the heads of all ECN members endorsed the ECN Model Leniency Programme²⁸⁹ (the "Model Programme") on 29 September 2006. The aim of this Programme is to remove certain discrepancies between the policies of the ECN Members and to facilitate multiple filings within the EU.
228. The Model Programme was drafted as a coherent document setting out the essential procedural and substantive elements that the ECN members believe every leniency programme should contain. It concerns only secret cartels, which are difficult to detect by other means.²⁹⁰ Its purpose is to harmonise the key elements of leniency policies, including inter alia the conditions for immunity from fines and the exclusion of certain applicants from the protection, marker system, information required for immunity and markers, conditions for reduction of fines and the maximum percentage for reduction of fines.²⁹¹ It foresees that coercers of the cartel are excluded from immunity.²⁹² The Model Programme also introduces a uniform summary application system that facilitates the procedure when an applicant wants to protect its position with one or more national competition authorities in addition to the Commission.²⁹³

229. Insofar as multiple filings are concerned, various alternative options were examined within the ECN in connection with the elaboration of the Model Programme but were rejected as unworkable in practice.²⁹⁴ A mutual recognition system, for instance, could, absent a high degree of harmonisation, invite forum shopping. In turn, the option that the Commission would act as a central decision-maker for immunity applications, besides being a heavy administrative task for the Commission, would entail disincentives for applicants and for national competition authorities. For cartels of smaller territorial scope, parties may be reluctant to approach the Commission. Moreover, a national competition authority that would deal with a case would be cut off from the early contacts with the applicant which are normally essential for the competition authority to target its investigation in an optimal way. Both options have in common that they would require that, in order to decide with effect for the whole Community, the approached authority would have to check that no other authority had sufficient information to launch an ex officio investigation. This would require extensive contacts at a very early stage of the case.
230. In the light of these considerations, the Model Programme opted for a summary application system for cases in which the Commission is “particularly well placed” to deal with the case (i.e. cases concerning more than three Member States).²⁹⁵ Where a full application has been made with the Commission, national competition authorities can accept temporarily to protect the applicant’s position on the basis of very limited information foreseen in the Model Programme. This information is broadly equivalent to information needed for a marker. Such information can be given orally.²⁹⁶ Should a national competition authority act on the case, it will grant the applicant a period of time to complete its application.

²⁹⁰ See paras 1-2 of the Explanatory Notes.

²⁹¹ See the Explanatory Notes. For instance, reductions of fines should not exceed 50% of the fine in order to ensure that there is a significant difference between immunity and reductions, so that it will be significantly more attractive to apply for immunity than wait to be the second in line.

²⁹² Para 8 of the Model Programme sets out that an undertaking which took steps to coerce another undertaking to participate in the cartel will not be eligible for immunity from fines. In general, the Model Programme does not prevent ECN members from adopting a more favourable approach. However, some programmes of ECN Members set out that they are not applicable to the sole ringleaders (see also footnote 4 of the Model Programme).

²⁹³ See paras 22-25 of the Model Programme and para 14 of the Network Notice.

²⁹⁴ For a further discussion of these options, see Gauer, C. and Jaspers, M.: Designing A European Solution For A “One Stop Leniency Shop”, E.C.L.R. 2006, 27(12), p. 685-692.

²⁹⁵ See para 14 of the Network Notice.

²⁹⁶ See in particular para 48 of the Explanatory Notes.

231. In this system, summary applications facilitate multiple filings and their processing by competition authorities where it is likely that the Commission will deal with the case. Undertakings that take part in cross-border cartels expose themselves to penalties in several jurisdictions. It is for the applicant to take the steps which it considers appropriate to protect its position with respect to possible proceedings by the relevant authorities.²⁹⁷

5.3.2. Way forward

232. In the stakeholder consultation, the legal and business community stated a strong preference for a more centralised approach for leniency in the European Union, some expressing a desire to see the matter dealt with by regulation. At the same time, practical experience suggests that potential applicants are generally aware of the system and undertake the necessary to protect their interests.

233. Whilst the Model Programme is not a legally binding document and does not prevent members from adopting a more favourable approach towards applicants, the ECN members have committed to use their best efforts to align their respective programmes with it.²⁹⁸

234. The work within the ECN has been a major catalyst in encouraging Member States and/or national competition authorities to introduce and develop their own leniency policies and in promoting convergence between them. The adoption of leniency programmes by the ECN members and their harmonisation with the Model Programme has progressed considerably during the reported period. Today, only Malta and Slovenia do not have any kind of leniency policy in place.

235. The Model Programme foresees that the ECN will evaluate the status of convergence of the leniency programmes as at the end of 2008. The assessment will form the basis for a reflection on whether further action is needed in this field.

5.3.3. Safeguards for leniency information within the ECN

236. In order not to discourage potential applicants from voluntarily reporting cartels, the Network Notice sets out special safeguards for the exchange and use of leniency related information. In particular, according to paragraph 39 of the Network Notice, leniency related information submitted pursuant to Article 11 of Regulation 1/2003 cannot be used by other authorities to start an investigation. According to paragraph 41, information submitted by a leniency applicant or collected on that basis, may only be exchanged between two authorities in the following circumstances: (i) the applicant consents to the exchange; or (ii) the applicant has applied for leniency with both authorities in the same case; or (iii) the receiving authority provides a written commitment not to use the information transmitted or any information it may obtain after the date of the transmission to impose sanctions on the applicant, its subsidiaries or its employees. In accordance with the Regulation, information so exchanged between the Commission and national authorities shall only be used in ²⁹⁷ See also para 38 of the Network Notice.

²⁹⁸ The Model Programme explicitly recognises that not all competition authorities have the power to implement changes in their national leniency programmes as this power is held by other bodies, see para 9 of the Explanatory Notes.

evidence for the purpose of applying Article 81 EC. It cannot be used for applying national laws, unless applied in parallel with Article 81 EC.²⁹⁹

237. In order to limit any negative consequences for leniency programmes by risk of disclosure of leniency information and documents, the Model Leniency Programme allows for oral applications in all cases where this would appear to be justified and proportionate.³⁰⁰ The Model Leniency Programme also foresees that no access will be granted to any records of any oral statements before the statement of objections has been issued. Moreover, the Model Leniency Programme foresees that the exchange of records of oral statements between authorities is limited to cases where the protections afforded to such records by the receiving authority are equivalent to those afforded by the transmitting authority.

5.4. Cooperation for fact-finding purposes

5.4.1. Information exchange pursuant to Article 12 of Regulation 1/2003

238. In contrast to Regulation 17, which contained only little provision for the exchange of information between the Commission and national competition authorities and none at all for the exchange of information between the national competition authorities, Regulation 1/2003 introduced an explicit provision concerning the exchange of information between all European competition authorities, including confidential information, and the use of such information as evidence.
239. Article 12(1) of Regulation 1/2003 empowers competition authorities to exchange information as intelligence irrespective of the (criminal or administrative) nature of the underlying proceedings and irrespective of whether sanctions are imposed on individuals, provided that the exchange occurs for the purpose of applying Articles 81 and 82 EC. Conversely, the use in evidence of information received from another competition authority is subject to certain additional conditions, as laid down in paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 12.
240. As far as proceedings against undertakings are concerned, Article 12(2) of Regulation 1/2003 assumes a sufficient degree of equivalence of the rights of defence in the different enforcement systems.³⁰¹ Information collected in one system can therefore be used in evidence in another system, provided that the general conditions of Article 12(2) are fulfilled, notably that the information may be used only for the purpose of applying Article 81 or 82 EC and in respect of the ‘subject-matter’ for which it was collected.
241. As far as proceedings against individuals are concerned, Article 12(3) of Regulation 1/2003 subjects the use in evidence of information received from other competition authorities to certain additional conditions.
- The use in evidence is possible under the first indent of Article 12(3) if the transmitting system also targets individuals and provides for sanctions of a similar ²⁹⁹ Article 12 (2).

³⁰⁰ According to para 14 of the Network Notice, oral applications are always justified and proportionate in cases where the Commission is “particularly well placed” to act.

³⁰¹ See recital 16.

kind (financial, custodial or other) in which case the Regulation presumes that there are sufficiently equivalent standards of rights of defence. The qualification of the sanctions or procedures at national level as administrative or criminal is irrelevant.

- Where the types of sanctions on individuals are materially different, information may only be exchanged for use in evidence if the information has been collected in a way that respects the same level of protection of the rights of the defence as provided for under the rules of the receiving authority (second indent, first sentence of Article 12(3)). A comparison regarding the level of protection is therefore required. However, Article 12(3), second indent last sentence provides that in this case information collected in a jurisdiction that does not provide for custodial sanctions cannot be used in evidence in another jurisdiction to seek the imposition of custodial sanctions.

242. The possibility to exchange and use information gathered by another competition authority has proven to be one of the cornerstones of the modernisation package, given that it greatly enhances the overall efficiency within the network and that it is a pre-condition for a flexible case-allocation system. Since the entry into force of Regulation 1/2003, information exchanges pursuant to Article 12 have taken place to and from the Commission and between the national competition authorities, notably in the following three scenarios:

- In the context of inspections, information exchange may enable several authorities that have received different pieces of information to obtain a more complete picture of a suspected infringement. Such exchanges strengthen the individual ECN members' ability to detect infringements. They occur normally at a very early stage of an investigation (prior to inspections) and are highly confidential.
- In the context of Article 22 inspections, the information collected on behalf of the requesting authority is transferred on the basis of Article 12.
- If a case is allocated between authorities or re-allocated to another authority, the information is passed on pursuant to Article 12.

243. The cases where information was not only exchanged but also used in evidence are more limited, and most of them are still ongoing. The majority of these cases are related to the Article 22 scenario (e.g. *Flat Glass*³⁰², Sanitary fittings). In this context, it was reported by national competition authorities that some difficulties were encountered in using the documents collected by another national competition authority due to different legislation on the confidentiality requirements.

244. As regards the conditions provided for by Article 12(3) and the use of evidence in case of sanctions on individuals, experience is very limited. No network member has reported any particular case where it had to carry out an analysis of the conditions of Article 12(3) in view of using information received from another network member, nor where it abstained from requesting potentially relevant information, nor where it was unable to use in evidence information relevant to a case for the imposition of custodial sanctions received from another network member.

See above, part 3.2.6.

245. In this context, a discussion has however arisen whether the ban on the use of information for the imposition of custodial sanctions where the law of the transmitting authority does not foresee such sanctions, as provided for by the last sentence of the second indent of Article 12(3), is too far-reaching and constitutes an obstacle to effective enforcement. In this regard, alternative concepts, such as the "double barrier" approach³⁰³ have been proposed. These considerations could also be relevant for future discussions concerning international cooperation agreements with selected jurisdictions.³⁰⁴

5.4.2. Assistance pursuant to Article 22 of Regulation 1/2003

246. Article 22(1) of Regulation 1/2003 gives Member States' competition authorities the power to carry out inspections or other fact-finding measures on behalf of another Member States' competition authority. The fact-finding measures are governed by the law of the Member State where they take place. That means that the investigation authority acts on the basis of its investigatory powers, as provided by national law, and has to respect the procedural rights of the undertakings under investigation, as provided by national law. The results of the investigatory measures may be exchanged on the basis of Article 12. Assistance pursuant to Article 22(1) has been successfully used within the network during the last five years. In the vast majority of cases, requests were followed up on by the requested authority and results have in particular fed into cartel investigations in the receiving national competition authorities. Assistance was requested and provided mainly in the context of inspections, witness interviews and requests for information.

247. Whereas generally this tool has proven to be very useful, some practical and legal issues have arisen in the last years. The practical issues are mainly linked to the partly limited resources of some national competition authorities and language issues. Legal issues arose primarily as a result of divergent national procedural frameworks and concerned for instance the acquisition of evidence, due to divergences in national legislation concerning the requirements to conduct an inspection or proceed with a request for information and with regard to varying powers to conduct Forensic IT searches.

5.5. The ECN as a forum to promote coherent application

5.5.1. Horizontal work in the ECN

248. Five years of experience have shown that the ECN is a successful forum to discuss general policy issues. The means of cooperation and the subjects of discussion have been manifold and have developed over time. Currently, policy work is organised at four different levels of organisation: the yearly meetings of the Directors General of the European Competition Authorities, the Plenary meetings, the horizontal working groups and the sector-specific subgroups. Discussions in the different fora have promoted a coherent approach and the coherent application of the EC antitrust rules.

³⁰³ According to the proposed concept of a "double barrier": (i) the transmitting authority would have to verify that the information transmitted can be used in conformity with its rules; and (ii) the receiving authority would have to verify that the information received can be used in conformity with its rules.

³⁰⁴ See below, part 7.2.

- The Director General's meeting is the forum for discussing major policy issues within the Network and constitutes the top level of the ECN framework. It takes place once per year and discussions have, for example, taken place on major topics such as the review of the Commission's policy on Article 82 EC, the ECN Leniency Model Programme, increases in food and energy prices and the financial crisis.³⁰⁵
- Another central forum is the "ECN Plenary" where horizontal antitrust issues of common interest policy are discussed, e.g. the ability of national competition authorities to disapply State measures in their application of the EC competition rules in combination with Article 10 EC, following the CIF ruling³⁰⁶ of the European Court of Justice. Cases undertaken by national competition authorities on this basis are typically complex and a debate was held on the conditions that must be met for the disapplication of anti-competitive State measures. Such exchange of experience and know-how has proved extremely beneficial in terms of further developing a common competition culture within the Network. Participants are normally officials of the national competition authorities responsible for ECN matters and officials of the ECN unit of the Directorate General for Competition.
- Under the "umbrella" of the Plenary, there is a varying number of working groups that deal with horizontal questions of legal, economic or procedural nature situated at the interface between Community law and diverse national laws (e.g. Cooperation issues, Leniency, Sanctions and ne bis in idem, Information and Communication, Article 82 EC, Competition Chief Economists, Vertical Restraints and Horizontal Agreements). For example, the Cooperation issues working group has addressed the implementation, and further refinement, of cooperation mechanisms within the ECN, such as cooperation on sector inquiries and requests for assistance from national competition authorities pursuant to Article 22 of Regulation 1/2003. Two working groups were created in the context of the review of the Commission's policy on horizontal agreements and vertical restraints. These working groups are tasked with exploring the case experience of enforcers in these fields and will feed into the Commission's review of the existing Block Exemption Regulations, and accompanying Guidelines, which are due to expire in 2010.
- In addition to the horizontal working groups, the ECN also encompasses 15 subgroups that deal with particular sectors (e.g. Banking; Securities; Insurance; Food; Pharmaceuticals; Professional Services; Healthcare; Environment; Energy; Railways; Motor Vehicles; Telecommunications; Media; Sports; Maritime transport). In these subgroups, expert officials of the national competition authorities and the Directorate General for Competition exchange views and best practices. They mainly deal with substantial questions, thus promoting a common culture in their sectors. Particularly active subgroups have been the subgroups on Energy, Banking and Pharmaceuticals and more recently the subgroup on Food. For example, the Energy subgroup group brought together national competition authorities and national regulators for high-level Energy Days in 2004, 2005,

See above, part 5.3.1.

Case C-198/01 Consorzio Industrie Fiammiferi (CIF) and Autorità Garante della Concorrenza e del Mercato [2003] ECR I-8055.

2006, 2007 at which, inter alia, the energy sector inquiry undertaken by the Commission was discussed. The Banking subgroup has engaged in detailed discussions on the MasterCard Decision and its follow-up, multilateral interchange fees ("MIFs") and the Single European Payment Area ("SEPA").³⁰⁷ The work in the ECN subgroups has also resulted in or contributed to some sectoral guidance on the application of Articles 81 and 82 EC, e.g. in the area of sport³⁰⁸ and waste management systems.³⁰⁹ Moreover, the Pharmaceuticals subgroup has been closely associated with the sector inquiry into pharmaceuticals. The Food subgroup became very active in 2008 in response to the sharp increase in some food prices. Experience was shared on the different actions taken by enforcers to address this issue (investigations, advocacy and inquiries).

249. This constant dialogue between the network members on all levels over the last years has significantly contributed to a coherent approach and coherent application of the EC competition rules. The permanent exchange of experiences and views, very often in an informal manner, has established confidence and trust between network members, increased the expertise and promoted convergence. It has led to the creation of a space to think that allows fruitful discussions in a spirit of close cooperation and with the final objective of promoting a common competition culture in Europe. This development over the last five years is highly appreciated by all network members and is certainly one of the major successes of the ECN. This achievement is widely recognised by the legal and business community which calls, however, for more transparency about ongoing discussions in the network.

5.5.2. Work on individual cases and envisaged decisions

250. The three main mechanisms to ensure coherent application of the EC competition rules provided for by Regulation 1/2003 are the following: (1) the obligation to apply Community law whenever there is an effect on trade in a manner that ensures convergence between national and Community law (Article 3(1)); (2) the obligation for national competition authorities to inform the Commission at the latest 30 calendar days before an envisaged decision is adopted (Article 11(4)); (3) the possibility for the Commission to intervene if there is a serious risk of incoherence, by relieving the national competition authority of its competence to act (Article 11(6)).
251. These formal mechanisms form the backbone of close and extensive cooperation within the ECN. In practice, the extent and intensity of this cooperation surpass by far what is strictly legally required.
252. Notably, Article 11(4) of Regulation 1/2003 is one of the key instruments to ensure consistent application of EC competition rules. Pursuant to Article 11(4) national competition authorities must inform the Commission at least 30 days prior to the adoption of a decision requiring that an infringement be brought to an end, accepting commitments or withdrawing the benefit of a block exemption regulation. The information supplied to the Commission may be shared with the other network members in order to improve horizontal cooperation and to stimulate European competition policy.

253. The purpose of Article 11(4) is to enable the Commission and the national competition authorities to ensure that Articles 81 and 82 EC are applied in a consistent manner within the network. The Commission has the possibility to make written observations on cases about which it is informed pursuant to Article 11(4) to the national competition authority in question.³¹⁰ In case of a major divergence, the Commission may decide to initiate formal proceedings in the same case, thus relieving the national competition authority of its competence to deal with this case pursuant to Article 11(6).
254. This information obligation applies to all types of envisaged decision referred to in Article 11(4) since the entry into application of Regulation 1/2003. The national competition authorities must submit the text of the envisaged decision and a summary of the case. Instead of a draft decision, the national competition authorities can also submit any other document which indicates the proposed course of action, in particular a statement of objections or other documents foreseen by national laws.
255. The Directorate General for Competition acknowledges receipt of information on envisaged decisions pursuant to Article 11(4), permitting undertakings to verify compliance with the obligations provided for by Article 11(4) in the proceedings of the national competition authority or, where they deem it appropriate, in appeal proceedings in the Member States.
256. So far, the Commission has been informed of more than 300 envisaged decisions submitted by the national competition authorities on the basis of Article 11(4). In none of these cases, proceedings have been initiated by the Commission pursuant to Article 11(6) with a view to relieving a national competition authority from its competence for reasons of coherent application.
257. The Directorate General for Competition has developed a practice over the last years of submitting observations to the national competition authorities in many cases.³¹¹ These observations have been provided mostly in an oral form but also in writing.³¹² These observations have been multi-faceted. They have covered minor comments or were related to particular aspects of the envisaged decisions in order to promote a uniform approach on these aspects concerned (e.g. product market definition); coordination with on-going Commission cases; or to case-law of the Community Courts. It should however be underlined that these observations did not contain any new evidence of any other information that would be exculpatory or incriminating for the parties of the proceedings.

³¹⁰ The Commission Notice on cooperation within the Network of Competition Authorities, OJ C 101, 27.04.2004, p.43, para 46.

³¹¹ See further part 5.6 on the confidentiality of communications between the Commission and national competition authorities.

³¹² In about 10% of the cases the observations of the Directorate General for Competition are provided in writing.

258. It should be underlined that any observations from the Commission's Directorate General for Competition³¹³ to national competition authorities, can only attempt to draw their attention to certain issues and point out matters that they may want to consider. It is for the Member States' competition authorities to take account of these observations as they consider appropriate. Every case is investigated and decided under the full and sole responsibility of the authority dealing with the case. However, the Commission has a special responsibility to ensure that the rules are applied in a coherent and uniform manner. If there is a risk of incoherence, the Commission shall take the necessary steps to avoid such an outcome.
259. These observations are normally taken very seriously and are carefully reflected upon by the national competition authorities. According to their views expressed in the context of the preparation of this report, the national competition authorities did not take into account the observations of the Commission in only a few cases, normally due to specific circumstances of the case.³¹⁴
260. Overall, it clearly results from the feedback received by the Commission in the context of the consultation for this Report that the mechanisms provided for by Article 11 of Regulation 1/2003 function very well and have led to the largely coherent and consistent application of EC competition rules in the ECN over the last five years. The concerns related to a major risk of incoherent and inconsistent application of EC competition law in a decentralised system that have been raised at the time of the adoption of the modernisation package have certainly not been realised. Only in respect of few individual cases have inconsistencies been alleged by stakeholders.
261. Nevertheless, from stakeholders' side there is a certain call on the Commission to explore further means to promote consistency within the network, such as a further strengthening of the mechanisms provided for in Article 11 (e.g. consultation instead of information, more systematic follow-up of observations and check of final decisions or appeal procedure to the Commission).

5.5.3. Article 11(6)

262. Article 11(6) of Regulation 1/2003 gives the Commission the possibility to intervene if there is a serious risk of incoherence. The initiation by the Commission of proceedings relieves the national competition authorities of their competence to apply Articles 81 and 82 EC. In substance, Article 11(6) has taken over Article 9(3) of Regulation 17, although its wording has changed. However, contrary to Regulation 17, the Commission is now obliged to consult the national competition authority already dealing with a case before initiating proceedings.
263. Article 11(6) has gained a new role in Regulation 1/2003 insofar as it gives the Commission the possibility, in principle, to take up any case from a national competition authority, even at a very late stage and after the submission of a draft decision, with a view to ensure coherent application. This scenario of a possible use ³¹³ Observations submitted by the Directorate General for Competition within this context only reflect the views of the services and cannot be regarded as stating an official position of the European Commission.

³¹⁴ E.g. specific market knowledge.

of Article 11(6) has to be distinguished from the regular use of Article 11(6) by the Commission to open proceedings in a case that the Commission intends to deal with.

264. The actual initiation of proceedings by the Commission with a view to 'correct' the approach taken by a Member State competition authority in an envisaged decision should be reserved to the severest problems of coherent application where they arise in a case that presents sufficient Community interest for the Commission to conduct its own procedure in the matter.³¹⁵ The Network Notice provides guidance as to the circumstances in which this may be envisaged.³¹⁶ Until now, the Commission has not seen the necessity of taking this step. As mentioned above, this may be attributed to various factors including notably the commitment of national competition authorities towards coherent application, extensive horizontal exchanges in the ECN including in dedicated sectoral subgroups, as well as informal exchanges between the Commission services and the national competition authorities in the context of the Article 11(4) submissions.

5.6. Confidentiality of information

5.6.1. The principle of professional secrecy in the network

265. The creation of the ECN was surrounded by concerns about safeguarding confidential information among a plurality of enforcers. However, pursuant to Article 28 of Regulation 1/2003 the Commission and the Member States' competition authorities shall not disclose any information which is covered by the principle of professional secrecy.³¹⁷ Article 28 applies to all network members and thus sets a common standard which needs to be protected throughout the EU.
266. The standard of Article 28 is inherited from Article 20 of Regulation 17. In the context of the latter, its main significance for Member States' competition authorities related to the documents that they received from the Commission in view of the meeting of the Advisory Committee. This aspect remained unchanged. Under Article 11(2) of Regulation 1/2003, the Commission is still obliged to provide Member States' competition authorities with copies of the most important documents that it has collected with a view to taking decisions pursuant to Articles 7 to 10 and 29. This means that Member States' competition authorities are well aware of, and are used to, protecting case related confidential documents emanating from another authority. The standard of protection that has always been applied to Commission documents is now extended to documents received from other Member State competition authorities.

5.6.2. Confidentiality of exchanges of views in the network

267. The other side of the coin is preserving the common space to think that has been fostered within the ECN. The ability to have a free and constructive exchange of ³¹⁵ See the Joint Statement of the Council and the Commission on the functioning of the Network of Competition Authorities, available at: <http://register.consilium.europa.eu/pdf/en/02/st15/15435-a1en2.pdf>, para 21.

³¹⁶ Network Notice, para 54.

³¹⁷ An exception applies if the disclosure of confidential information is required to prove the infringement (point 28(a) of the Network Notice). For the Commission the exception is explicitly confirmed in Article 27(2) of Council Regulation 1/2003 and Article 15(3) of Commission Regulation 773/2004.

views between the competition authorities within the ECN is a key component for the success of the Network and for the effective enforcement of Articles 81 and 82 EC. Experience has shown that the authorities are ready to engage in such fruitful discussions, provided that the views they share in that context are kept confidential. Granting access to documents that have been created solely for this purpose to anyone outside the Network will inevitably have a negative impact on the way the system functions today. For this reason observations submitted in an Article 11(4) procedure are treated as network internal documents.³¹⁸

5.7. Concluding remark

268. The sharing of knowledge and experience in the network has triggered a very open and constructive dialogue with the national competition authorities which fosters the coherent application of Articles 81 and 82 EC and thereby contributes to one of the central objectives of Regulation 1/2003.

6. INTERACTION WITH NATIONAL COURTS

6.1. Application of Articles 81 and 82 EC by national courts

269. National courts play a key role in the enforcement of European competition law and, since the entry into application of Regulation 1/2003, have the power to apply both Articles 81 and 82 EC in full. National courts may be called upon to apply Article 81 and 82 EC in a variety of scenarios: some national courts have jurisdiction for lawsuits between private parties, such as actions relating to contracts or actions for damages; some national courts act as public enforcers (e.g. in Austria, Finland and Ireland); and some national courts act as review courts, hearing appeals which are brought against decisions of the national competition authorities.
270. Stakeholders have pointed to what they perceive as uneven enforcement of the EC competition rules by national courts. Nevertheless, it is apparent that national courts have applied Articles 81 and 82 EC in a variety of sectors and have tackled a range of issues.³¹⁹ For example, national courts have dealt under Article 82 EC with exclusionary behaviour (refusal of access, rebates, long-term supply agreements, refusal to deal) of former incumbents in liberalising sectors, such as energy, postal services and telecoms. Exclusionary behaviour was also assessed by national courts in relation to e.g. port services, television advertising and ice cream freezer exclusivity agreements. National courts have also addressed exploitative behaviour under Article 82 EC, with most cases involving allegations of excessive pricing. In terms of the application of Article 81 EC, as noted above many cases involved the application of the Block Exemption Regulations.³²⁰ A number of cases also related to the setting of minimum fees by professional associations by e.g. lawyers, dentists and veterinarians.

³¹⁸ Article 27(2) of Regulation 1/2003 states that the Commission regards correspondence between ECN members as internal documents that are not accessible. In addition, Article 28 of Regulation 1/2003 extends the principle of professional secrecy that applies to the Commission and its services also to national competition authorities. See in this context also the Judgment of the Stockholm Administrative Court of Appeal, no. 7300/05 of 23.05.2006 (Kammarrättens dom den 23 maj 2006 i mål nr 7300-05), by which the Court upheld a decision of the Swedish Competition Authority denying a party access to the Directorate General for Competition's observations submitted in the context of an Article 11(4) procedure. The Court relied on the professional secrecy clause in Article 28 of Regulation 1/2003 and found that the public interest of ensuring a continued cooperation and exchange of information between national and EU authorities overruled the parties' interest to obtain access.

³¹⁹ For details of the sources of information about national court judgments available to the Commission, see part 6.2.3 below.

271. Particular responsibility is incumbent on national courts exercising judicial review of decisions of national competition authorities. Whereas the national competition authorities and the Commission cooperate in the ECN, a similar degree of cooperation and exchange of ideas cannot be achieved for review courts. They may therefore want to consider the available cooperation mechanisms.
272. An important way in which national courts contribute to the further development of Community competition law is by using the possibility to make references for preliminary rulings under Article 234 EC. While Regulation 1/2003 has not so far given rise to a large number of references, certain interesting cases can be cited.
273. In 2008, the European Court of Justice ruled on a reference for a preliminary ruling from the Supreme Court of Ireland in relation to a scheme of the Beef Industry Development Society Ltd ("BIDS"), whose members sold approximately 93% of the beef sold in Ireland.³²¹ Under this scheme, some beef processors undertook to leave the processing industry, decommission their processing plants and respect a two year non-compete clause in return for compensation from the remaining members of BIDS. The Irish Competition Authority challenged the BIDS scheme and made an application to the Irish High Court, but the Irish High Court dismissed its application, having found that Article 81(1) EC had not been breached. The Irish Competition Authority appealed this decision to the Irish Supreme Court, which referred to the Court of Justice a question asking whether the BIDS arrangement should be regarded as being restrictive of competition by object and prohibited under Article 81(1) EC or, alternatively, whether it is necessary, in order to reach this conclusion, to demonstrate first that this arrangement had anti-competitive effects. The Court of Justice, in an important ruling, confirmed that such agreements between competitors to restrict capacity or production are restrictions of competition by object within the meaning of Article 81(1) EC.
274. Another interesting reference for a preliminary ruling, which relates to the evidence which must be adduced before national courts when proving an infringement of Article 81 EC, is referred to above.³²²
275. Moreover, in VEBIC, the European Court of Justice is asked to rule on questions referred to it by the Belgian review court on the interpretation of Articles 2, 15(3) and 35(1) of Regulation 1/2003 with regard to the involvement of the Belgian competition authorities in the appeal proceedings.³²³

6.2. Application of Article 15 of Regulation 1/2003

276. A network involving the national courts similar to the ECN would sit uneasily with the independent position of the judiciary. Nevertheless, Regulation 1/2003 provides for a number of devices to promote coherency, building on the mutual duty of loyal cooperation provided for by Article 10 EC.³²⁴

6.2.1. Opinions

277. Under Article 15(1), national courts can ask the Commission for information or its opinion on questions concerning the application of Articles 81 and 82 EC. As of 31 March 2009, the Commission has issued opinions on 18 occasions to national courts in Belgium (5), Spain (9), Lithuania (1), The Netherlands (1) and Sweden (2).

278. The opinions issued to Spanish courts all concerned litigation between service station operators and wholesale suppliers of petroleum products. In most cases, the service station operators were seeking a declaration of nullity of the contract they have concluded with the wholesaler on the grounds that it infringed EC competition law.

279. The other opinions issued by the Commission relate to a wide variety of matters. The Commission has given opinions to Belgian courts on: exclusive purchasing agreements for beer and non-beer beverages; the application of Articles 81 and 82 EC to exhibitions; the application of Article 82 EC to favourable conditions and rebates granted by collecting societies; the conformity of the general conditions in a pilotage contract, including an exoneration of responsibility and an indemnity clause, with Article 82 EC; and the applicability of Articles 81 and 82 EC to the exclusion of one of the members of a standards setting organisation.

280. Two opinions were given to Swedish courts, the first of which concerned the issue of whether a municipality can be concerned to be as "undertaking" under Articles 81 and 82 EC with a "legitimate interest" to complain pursuant to Article 7(2) of Regulation 1/2003. The second related to the definition of the relevant market in a case where a port was alleged to have abused its dominant position as the provider of port services by charging excessive fees to a Danish state-owned ferry operator.

281. In an opinion given to a Dutch national court, the Commission provided guidance on whether quota allocations for mussel seeds in The Netherlands which set by an association of mussel farmers for its members, fell to be assessed under Articles 81 and 82 EC or whether it came within the scope of Regulation 26/62 on the application of competition rules to agricultural products. Finally, the Commission provided an opinion to a Lithuanian court on whether it was compatible with Article 86(1) EC, in conjunction with Article 82 EC, for a municipality to carry out a tender procedure for the award of an exclusive right to collect waste for 15 years.

282. Some stakeholders have highlighted what they perceive as reluctance on the part of some national judges to seek opinions from the Commission under Article 15(1). To try to address this issue, the Commission has published examples of opinions given to national courts on the Directorate General for Competition's website so that national courts can get an idea of what an opinion can provide.³²⁵ Guidance is also given on the Directorate General for Competition's website detailing what requests for opinions should contain.

6.2.2. "Amicus curiae" observations

283. Both the Commission and the national competition authorities have the power to make observations in proceedings before national courts under Article 15(3). Whereas the Commission has the power to intervene pursuant to Article 15(3) "where the coherent application of Article 81 or Article 82 of the Treaty so requires", national competition authorities have broader scope to do so on any "issues relating to the application" of Article 81 or 82 EC. In addition, Article 15 established a minimum standard and certain national laws provide for wider powers for national competition authorities.³²⁶ Indeed, this is a tool which is well used by several national competition authorities. The Commission on its part, has decided to submit amicus observations on two occasions during the reporting period, where it considered that there was an imminent threat to the coherent application of the EC competition rules.
284. In 2006, the Commission for the first time made use of Article 15(3) by presenting written observations to the Cour d'appel de Paris in the "Garage Gremeau" case concerning the interpretation of the concept of quantitative selective distribution in Commission Regulation No. 1400/2002 (the "Motor Vehicle Block Exemption Regulation").³²⁷ The question of whether a car distribution system is selective and if so, whether the selection criteria are quantitative or qualitative in nature, has important legal and practical implications. Subject to compliance with other conditions, distribution agreements of car suppliers with a market share not exceeding 30% benefit from the block exemption under Regulation 1400/2002. This threshold rises to 40% for quantitative selective distribution agreements and qualitative selective distribution agreements benefit from the block exemption irrespective of the market share of the supplier. Article 1(1)(f)-(h) of the Motor Vehicle Block Exemption Regulation defines a selective distribution as being qualitative where the supplier selects distributors according to uniformly applicable and non-discriminatory criteria that are only qualitative in nature, are required by the nature of the goods (e.g. to preserve its quality and ensure its proper use) and do not directly limit the number of authorised distributors. By contrast, in a quantitative selective distribution system, the supplier uses selection criteria that directly limit the number of authorised distributors.
285. The case at issue was brought by Garage Gremeau against DaimlerChrysler France which had terminated all of its existing distribution contracts with a view to restructuring its distribution system on the basis of quantitative selection, in light of Regulation 1400/2002. It refused to conclude a new distribution agreement with its ³²⁵ This is only done once the judgment in the court case concerned has been rendered and is subject to conformity with national procedural rules: <http://ec.europa.eu/competition/court/requests.html>.

³²⁶ For example, in Germany, the law goes further than Art. 15(3) of Reg. 1/2003. The national competition authority has the power to appoint a representative authorised to submit written statements, attend hearings, give evidence and address questions to the parties, witnesses and experts, (s 90(2) Gesetz gegen Wettbewerbsbeschränkungen (GWB)).

³²⁷ Commission Regulation (EC) No 1400/2002 of 31 July 2002 on the application of Article 81(3) of the Treaty to categories of vertical agreements and concerted practices in the motor vehicles sector, OJ 2002 L 203 of 01.08.2002p.30.

former agreed distributor Garage Gremeau on the basis that it would exceed the number of distributors foreseen as it had appointed another distributor for the area in question. Garage Gremeau requested by way of remedy that it should be admitted to DaimlerChrysler's network. This was refused at first instance and on appeal. The Cour de Cassation subsequently affirmed the appeal court's finding that DaimlerChrysler's criterion of nominating a certain number of authorised distributors for different sales territories was objective and precise, but held that the lower court should have examined both the objectivity of its other selection criteria and how these were implemented, in particular because the new authorised distributor in Burgundy did not fulfil these at the time of its appointment. These judgments generated considerable interest in the sector, including in other Member States.

286. The Commission intervened to clarify that quantitative selective distribution systems do not have to fulfil the same requirements as those applicable for qualitative selective distribution systems, meaning that it is not necessary to assess the objectivity of the selection criteria other than those for determining the number of distributors. If that were the case, the categories of quantitative and qualitative selective distribution would be conflated, contrary to Regulation 1400/2002. With regard to any assessment of the implementation of the selection criteria, the Commission observed that there does not appear to be any basis on Regulation 1400/2002 for preventing a supplier from foreseeing a transitional period for fulfilling its requirements if it considers that a given candidate has the financial and technical potential. Otherwise, this would tend to limit access to existing authorised distributors who have already made the necessary investments, foreclosing more competitive newcomers. This case is currently subject to a stay of proceedings. Stakeholders have noted that the Commission's intervention was very useful in that it could be invoked in similar proceedings before other national courts.
287. The Commission also decided to make observations pursuant to Article 15(3) of Regulation 1/2003 in a case in The Netherlands concerning the tax deductibility of Commission competition fines. In the initial judgment of 22 May 2006 on this issue, the Dutch Rechtbank van Haarlem (Court of First Instance in Haarlem, notably in tax matters) ruled that fines imposed by the Commission for infringement of the EC competition rules are partially deductible from income tax. The court found that although Dutch law provides that administrative fines cannot be deducted from income tax, fines imposed by the Commission cannot be understood according to the national definition of "fine" as, unlike fines imposed under Dutch law, they consist of punitive elements and elements intended to skim off illegal gains.
288. This judgment was appealed to the Gerechtshof van Amsterdam (Belastingkamer) (Court of Appeal of Amsterdam, tax chamber). The Commission moved to intervene as amicus curiae to highlight that Community fines for breach of the EC competition rules are not intended to skim off illegal gains and that the principle of equivalence would be breached if fines imposed under EC competition law could be deducted in contrast to fines under national law. Moreover, it would go against the principle of effectiveness, as the impact of Commission decisions would necessarily be reduced if companies fined for the violation of Articles 81 and 82 EC could (at least partially) deduct the amount from national income tax.
289. In an intermediary judgment of 12 September 2007, the Gerechtshof van Amsterdam decided to ask for a preliminary ruling to the European Court of Justice under Article

234 EC regarding the possibility for the Commission to intervene on the basis of Article 15(3) in such national (tax) litigation. The ruling of the Court should provide useful clarification regarding the scope of Article 15(3) of Regulation 1/2003.³²⁸

290. In sum, the Commission's role as amicus curiae pursuant to Article 15(3) of Regulation 1/2003 is to intervene in cases that have important policy implications for the application of Articles 81 and 82 EC. Stakeholders have called on the Commission to have greater recourse to this instrument and it should be reflected upon how this practice should further develop.

6.2.3. Transmission of judgments

291. Article 15(2) of Regulation 1/2003 requires Member States to forward to the Commission a copy of any written judgment of national courts deciding on the application of Articles 81 or 82 EC. These judgments must be sent "without delay after the full written judgment is notified to the parties". The Commission publishes a database of the judgments it receives from the Member States pursuant to Article 15(2). This database, although welcomed as potentially being a valuable source of case practice, is criticised by several stakeholders on the grounds that it is far from complete.³²⁹ Some stakeholders have provided suggestions for improving the functioning of Article 15(2). For example, it has been proposed that the national competition authorities should be given the duty of assembling the relevant judgments in their respective territories and transmitting them to the Commission, as is currently done in several Member States. It is further proposed that this could be combined with a procedural duty on litigants to serve their initial pleadings on the Commission and/or national competition authority concerned, so that the latter could be alerted to the litigation at an early stage.³³⁰ Overall, options for ensuring a more efficient and effective way of providing access to national court judgments should be contemplated.

³²⁸ Case C-429/07, Reference for a preliminary ruling from the Gerechtshof Amsterdam (The Netherlands) lodged on 22 May 2006 Inspecteur van de Belastingdienst v X BV, OJ C-429/07 of 08.12.2007, p.23 and the Opinion of Advocate-General Mengozzi of 05.03.2009, not yet reported.

³²⁹ There are approximately 175 judgments in this database (12 Member States have not sent judgments). Numerous stakeholders have highlighted that they are aware of judgments taken by national courts in which Articles 81 or 82 EC have been applied that do not appear in the database. The database of judgments transmitted by the Member States is currently complemented by a compilation of judgments handed down by national courts from 2006 onwards which is prepared by most national competition authorities for their respective jurisdictions and is made available on the Directorate General for Competition's website at <http://ec.europa.eu/competition/elojade/antitrust/nationalcourts/>. Parts 3 of the 2004 and 2005 Annual Reports on Competition Policy, available at: http://ec.europa.eu/competition/annual_reports/, also contain sections on the application of the EC competition rules by national courts.

³³⁰ This is the practice for instance in the UK where any party whose statement of case raises or deals with an issue relating to the application of Articles 81 and 82 EC or the equivalent national provisions must serve a copy of the statement of the case on the Office of Fair Trading as the same time as it is served on the other parties to the claim. See Practice Direction – Competition Law – Claims Relating to the Application of Articles 81 and 82 of the EC Treaty and Chapters I and II of Part 1 of the Competition Act 1998, para. 3. The same duty of notification is imposed on appellants. See Practice Direction 52 – Appeals, para. 21.10A. By contrast, Hungarian law entrusts courts with this duty as opposed to litigants, providing that the court shall notify without delay the European Commission and the Hungarian Competition Authority of lawsuits before it which are to be assessed under Articles 81 and 82 EC (Article 91/H of the Hungarian Competition Act). This obligation applies over and above the duty of national courts to forward final judgments deciding on the application of Articles 81 and 82 to the Hungarian Ministry of Justice.

6.2.4. Training of judges

292. There is a perception among some that national judges may have limited knowledge of Community law and/or have difficulties in accessing up-to-date information.³³¹ Stakeholders have also called for national judges to be more proactive in raising potential EC competition law issues.³³² Continuous training and education of national judges in EC competition law is therefore crucial in order to ensure the effective and coherent application of those rules and to raise awareness of the mechanisms for cooperation with the Commission which are available. Since 2002, the Commission has co-financed 35 training projects, which have provided for the training of approximately 3,500 judges by the end of 2007. In 2008, 15 grant agreements were concluded for new projects for the training of judges. A call for new proposals was also launched in October 2008.

7. INTERFACE WITH THIRD COUNTRY ENFORCEMENT

293. The Commission attaches great importance to fostering constructive cooperation with third country authorities, in particular as concerns infringements with an international dimension. The effectiveness of international cooperation is interdependent on the effectiveness of Commission's own investigations for the enforcement of Articles 81 and 82 EC. During the reported period, issues of disclosure of information from the Commission's file in third jurisdictions arose. Such issues were encountered in the context of private litigation in third jurisdictions and, to a lesser extent, with respect to third country public authorities.

7.1. Private litigation in third jurisdictions

294. The Commission is a strong proponent of effective damages actions so that victims of infringements of EC competition law can be fully compensated for the harm they have suffered.³³³ However, in certain circumstances there is a balance to be struck between public enforcement interests in the EU and the interests of private litigants in third country jurisdictions. Disclosure of information from the Commission's file in the context of private litigation in third jurisdictions, in particular of leniency statements submitted during the investigation, may seriously undermine the effectiveness of public antitrust enforcement. The Commission has a particular interest to ensure that its investigations and the effectiveness of its enforcement programmes³³⁴ are not undermined by disclosure.

³³² Joined cases C-430/93 and C-431/93 van Schijndel [1995] ECR I-4705, paras 13-15, 19 and 22 sets out the extent of the duty of national courts to raise binding EC rules, such as the EC competition rules, of their own motion.

295. Article 15(4) of Regulation 773/2004 provides that documents obtained through access to the file shall only be used for the purposes of judicial or administrative proceedings for the application of Articles 81 and 82 EC.³³⁵ Accordingly, they shall not be disclosed for any other purpose.
296. The Commission's statement of objections and the full confidential version of the decision are documents prepared specifically for the antitrust proceedings and contain confidential information received through investigative measures.³³⁶ Therefore, they and the information contained therein shall also be used only for the purpose of proceedings concerning the application of Articles 81 and 82 EC.³³⁷
297. The Commission has taken further initiatives to safeguard its administrative file. Specific protection has been given to voluntary statements made in the context of its Leniency Policy³³⁸, in particular, the oral procedure was formally introduced for leniency applications. Equivalent safeguards are foreseen for settlement submissions.³³⁹ Access to such statements is granted only to the addressees of the statement of objections provided they commit not to make any copies by mechanical or electronic means of any information contained therein and to use information obtained from such statements only for the purpose stated in the Commission Notice on the rules for access to the Commission file.
298. Undertakings which fail to comply with the obligations set out in the preceding paragraphs may face negative consequences. A breach of the obligation not to use information obtained through access to file for any other purpose during the proceeding by leniency applicants may be regarded as lack of cooperation under the Leniency Notice. Pursuant to the Guidelines on the method of setting fines³⁴⁰, refusal to cooperate with or obstruction of the Commission in carrying out its investigations may be considered as an aggravating circumstance in any Commission prohibition decision. If any such use is made after the Commission has already adopted a prohibition decision in the proceeding, the Commission may, in any legal proceedings before the Community Courts, ask the Court to increase the fine in respect of the responsible undertaking. Notice (point 36) explicitly provide that should the information be used for a different purpose, at any point in time, with the involvement of an outside counsel, the Commission may report the incident to the bar of that counsel, with a view to disciplinary action.

299. The Commission has intervened through amicus curiae briefs before courts of the US, where US legislation and its application by US courts allows discovery that is exceptionally broad and relatively uncertain as to its outcome³⁴¹, to highlight the threat of discovery to its investigative processes. Such briefs were submitted in the Vitamins case³⁴², and the Methionine litigation.³⁴³ The Directorate General for Competition has also submitted letters to litigants in a number of proceedings in the US against the discoverability of information that has been prepared solely for the purpose of its investigation, either by the parties or by the Commission itself, including the recent Rubber Chemicals litigation.³⁴⁴
300. On 4 April 2006, the Directorate General for Competition made a submission to the US Antitrust Modernisation Commission concerning the impact of discovery rules in antitrust civil damages actions in the United States on the Commission's antitrust enforcement. It explained why it believes that the disclosure of statements and submissions, especially corporate statements, which are specifically prepared by undertakings within the context of the Commission's antitrust proceedings should not be deemed discoverable to third parties. The disclosure of such information submitted on a voluntary basis during the Commission's investigation could seriously undermine the effectiveness of the Commission's and other authorities' antitrust enforcement actions. In particular, undertakings which voluntarily cooperate with the Commission in revealing cartels cannot be put in a worse position in respect of civil claims than other cartel members which refuse cooperation. The ordered production, or uncertainty in this regard, of submissions that a company has prepared and produced exclusively for the European Commission's antitrust proceedings in civil proceedings for damages could seriously undermine the effectiveness of the Leniency Programme and jeopardise the Commission's investigation of cartels. In contrast, the Commission does not have an interest in generally protecting pre-existing documents from discovery.³⁴⁵ Nevertheless, when the investigation is

This case concerned disclosure of corporate statements, where the investigation which was still on-going. ³⁴⁴ In Re: Rubber Chemicals Antitrust Litigation, Case No. C04-1648 MJJ (BZ). The plaintiff requested discovery of the documents provided by the defendant to the Commission in the context of the Leniency Programme. The defendant submitted to the US Court a letter from the Directorate General for Competition, which expressed opposition to discovery of those documents. The court denied discovery of the documents requested.

The leniency programme and other forms of voluntary cooperation should not act as a shield for companies seeking to conceal information that would otherwise be subject to disclosure/discoverable.

ongoing, pre-existing documents should be shielded from discovery, insofar as it could reveal the Commission's investigative strategy.

301. In conclusion, the Commission attaches particular importance to the protection of information and documents against disclosure in private litigation in third countries insofar as this would operate to the detriment of its enforcement tools. It should be examined how the legal framework can be clarified and reinforced to further enhance existing levels of protection.

7.2. Third country public authorities

7.2.1. Enforcement cooperation

302. The Commission enhances effective enforcement of competition rules through international cooperation with third country authorities. Such cooperation may include sharing experience, coordination of enforcement actions and exchange of information to facilitate enforcement activities.
303. Cooperation with third country enforcement authorities is agreed by bi-lateral or multi-lateral agreements or is arranged through regular contacts. The European Union has agreements concerning competition matters with a number of countries and regions.³⁴⁶ Cooperation between the European Commission and the EFTA Surveillance Authority in antitrust matters is governed by the terms of Protocol 23 concerning the cooperation between surveillance authorities.³⁴⁷
304. So-called dedicated cooperation agreements on competition policy were signed with the United States, Canada and Japan.³⁴⁸ Under these agreements, competition authorities exchange non-confidential information and co-ordinate their enforcement activities. Furthermore, each side may ask the other to take enforcement action (positive comity); and each side must take account of the other's significant interests when enforcing competition rules (traditional comity).
305. Cooperation with competition authorities of other OECD member countries is based on the 1995 OECD recommendation.³⁴⁹
306. Regulation 1/2003 does not specifically regulate exchange of information with third country enforcement authorities. Article 12 of the Regulation is applicable only to the exchange of information between the Commission and the Member States for the purpose of application of Article 81 and 82 EC. Under the agreements with the United States, Canada and Japan, the European Commission and each respective competition authority exchange information. However, the existing cooperation agreements expressly exclude the exchange of protected or confidential information.

³⁴⁶ A list of countries and regions with which the European Union has signed a bilateral or multilateral agreement concerning competition matters is available at <http://ec.europa.eu/competition/international/bilateral/>.

³⁴⁹ See at http://ec.europa.eu/competition/international/bilateral/oecd_recommendation_1995.pdf.

This means in practice that no information obtained through the formal investigative tools can be shared with the other authority without the specific consent ("waivers") of the companies involved.³⁵⁰

307. International cooperation with third country enforcers may involve cooperating with third countries which have a criminal enforcement system for cartels, in which both undertakings and individuals can be prosecuted. The possibility of exchanging evidence between competition authorities is an essential element of efficient cooperation in the enforcement of the competition rules in an ever increasing globalised world. The Report on Cooperation between Competition Agencies in Cartel Investigations for the ICN Annual conference in Moscow states that the limitations to exchange of information are a major problem for efficient cooperation in the fight against international cartels: "Insufficient cooperation between agencies may allow some cartels to escape detection completely, if the evidence required for their conviction is scattered in different jurisdictions which cannot share it for legal reasons."³⁵¹
308. However, the conclusion of an international cooperation agreement which allows for the exchange of evidence with enforcers in selected third countries with a criminal enforcement system comes up against the obstacle that inside the EU, Article 12(3), last sentence of Regulation 1/2003 prohibits the use of information collected by one authority by the receiving authority to impose custodial sanctions, insofar as the law of the transmitting authority does not provide for sanctions of a similar kind for the infringement of Articles 81 or 82 EC. This raises the difficulty that it would be awkward for the EU to go further in terms of information exchange with third country enforcers than is currently the case for enforcers inside the Union. As noted above³⁵², it may be appropriate to reflect upon the limitation on authorities using information they received to impose custodial sanctions set out in Article 12(3), last sentence of Regulation 1/2003 and to examine if other options are available, while fully preserving parties' rights of defence.

7.2.2. Disclosure to third country public authorities

309. The Commission attaches great importance to fostering constructive cooperation with third country public authorities. The effectiveness of international cooperation is, however, interdependent on the effectiveness of Commission's own investigations and its Leniency Programme, in particular as concerns infringements with an international dimension. Disclosure of documents from the Commission's file to third country public authorities is therefore subject to certain limitations.
310. In this context, the legal requirements set out in section 7.1 above are equally applicable. These considerations do not, in general, preclude the submission to third country public authorities of documents that exist independently of the Commission's investigation and which are in possession of undertakings independently of their access to the Commission file or of other information received from the Commission in the course of proceedings. Nevertheless, when the Commission investigation is still on-going, protection from disclosure may be needed in order to safeguard the investigation.

311. The issue of disclosure to third country public authorities merits further consideration, in particular in light of deepening and enhancing cooperation with third country authorities. It should be further examined in the context of the reflection suggested above.³⁵³

8. CONCLUSION

312. Regulation 1/2003 has brought about a landmark change in the way the European competition law is enforced. The Regulation has significantly improved the Commission's enforcement of Articles 81 and 82 EC. The Commission has been able to become more proactive, tackling weaknesses in the competitiveness of key sectors of the economy in a focussed way. Moreover the Regulation has entrusted the Member States' competition authorities and courts with the role of ensuring that the EU competition rules are applied efficiently and effectively, in conjunction with the Commission.
313. The EC competition rules have to a large extent become the "law of the land" for the whole of the EU. Cooperation in the ECN has contributed towards ensuring their coherent application. The network is an innovative model of governance for the implementation of Community law by the Commission and Member State authorities.
314. In a limited number of areas, the Report which is accompanied by the present Staff Working Paper highlights aspects which merit further evaluation, but leaves open the question of whether any amendment to the existing rules or practice is required. It will serve as a basis for the Commission to assess, in a further stage, whether it is appropriate to take further policy initiatives.
